

THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXII.
AGONISING REALISATIONS—STRIVINGS FOR LIBERTY.

He was disappointed so far, for she had not even begun to write. She had been pacing the chamber for a part of the time thinking over what she should say, what language to use, what words of passionate appeal and entreaty she should employ, how strongly and solemnly she could give her promises of renunciation and expiation.

"What, art thou begun yet?" he inquired, and his voice was thick and unsteady. In truth so was his gait, for he and Moll had been drinking, as they often did together, and to an extent which left them many a time helpless till a night's heavy sleep removed the effects of the debauch.

"Not, yet, Dick," answered Annabel. "I must think well how to express myself for I know how important it is that I should do so."

"Well, you had better set about it to-night, for I'm going to-morrow, and I'll post it there."

"Oh, bless you, Dick; heaven bless you for that kindness," exclaimed Annabel.

He laid down the fresh candle with a clunk, cast a half drunken look at her flushed face, and tramped away down the dark and narrow stair, leaving Annabel to begin the task she had undertaken.

Flushed as we have said with hope and excitement Annabel lighted the new candle, and sat down to pen the all important letter. The work engaged her for hours, and absorbed her mind, rendering her oblivious to the fact that the night had become wild and stormy, that the wind howled around the chimneys of the old house, making weird and dreary sounds as it struck the walls and whistled along the corridor, and caused the ivy to rattle against the window panes.

Annabel heard nothing of all this as she sat with her whole soul bent on her task. She wrote as if she were in Mrs Langton's presence, and were lying pleading at her feet, and was fearful lest anything she could urge as an argument or an inducement should be forgotten. And surely never was greater earnestness, or fervour, or pathos penned. She described as only one who was realising it could, the horrors of her imprisonment and the mental suffering she was enduring, and adjured by all that was human in her nature to have pity and release her, promising with every oath it was possible to take, to renounce Rockstone in her favour, and pass away forever from the sight and knowledge of everyone one in England who knew her.

These appeals she repeated with every variation of effective language, till it seemed as if the hardest heart must be softened to relenting; and when the large sheet was filled and crossed, and even her bursting feelings could command no further words, she closed the letter with her signature, and, laying down the pen with a sigh, fervently prayed that heaven would move the woman's heart to mercy.
