

BERENICE.

Mrs. Chudleigh opened the door of her cottage, and came into the midst of the gloomy, freezing cold, a wistful, anxious look on her white face.

"Presently there came an answer. "Yes, it is coming, mother," said the sturdy little figure who appeared upon the summit of an icy knoll.

"Ah, Bessie! I have been so anxious, and you are so cold!"

"No, not a bit; but I took a longer tramp than usual. But only see the fog! It is so clear and rich as butter!"

The woman's warm, moonlight face lit up to absolute radiance, and a tenderness that gray eyes, as they rested on the boy—a stalwart, sturdy little fellow, robed and wrapped like an Esquimaux, with white hair, and an honest, manly face.

"When they had crossed the threshold, she kissed him, parting the frozen locks of his hair, and his eyes, which she had seen and heaped the fire with fagots.

"There, now, mother," he said, as the ruddy light shot up the broad chimney, "isn't that nice? Now you shall sit down and get real warm, my mother."

"I'm such a strong fellow, I never get tired." Bessie threw on fresh fagots, and got out his illuminator, primer to anneal him.

"The last eyes filled with childhood's tears as he watched her, and his face grew solemn with a vague, doubtful wonder."

"Mother," he said at last, just the least quiver in his voice, "mother, was it all right between you and father when he went away? I've wanted to know so long."

"Oh, my poor, dear mother!" he whispered, going to her side, and dropping kisses and caressing touches on her bowed head, "I'm so sorry! I didn't think it would hurt you."

"The dew had fallen on his cheeks in silence, and still sobbing. His childish question had cut her heart like a knife."

"Why, Bessie," he said, now a bit cross, and decided, "you know I gave it to you. I always give you things I wish taken care of."

"A foolish habit, too," retorted Berenice, spitefully. "Why not take care of yourself, and don't you hear, I won't have any more of your things, and you know it!"

"Ben looked down at the promiscuous papers, and amid them, old love letters and tints of faded pictures, that had passed between him and Berenice in the years of their courtship."

"Why, Bessie," he began, and then finding his voice, he stopped short and turned away.

"I shan't look another bit," she said pettishly, pushing the papers aside with her pretty foot. "I've wasted my so, I am going now, then, Berenice."

"Goody!" from the room and out into the yard. Bessie was standing breathless, heard him kiss the child and say:

"Goody, little one! Be a good boy to mother, don't forget!"

"That was the last. When, after a moment of stunned bewilderment, she hurried to the door he was gone."

"But he would come back. All day long, sitting with Berenice on her knee, she said it over and over, he would come back, and they would make it up."

"But night came, and in the dusk of the evening, as a sailor came up for her last hand's best gift, Berenice was so proud and sensitive to ask a question or send a message; but the long, lonely night subdued her pride."

"As soon as was too late—the craft had sailed at daybreak, and her husband was gone."

"Month followed month, year drifted after year, and Berenice lived, and Bessie grew father's partner and comrade."

"The child could not sleep. Her eyes, or the stinging remorse from her heart, and now she sat there by the fire, with her thin hands clasped, and fingering, with her poor little Ben's faded shining eyes, that poor little Ben's faded and frightened, and creeping away to kiss her again."

"But the child could not sleep. Her eyes, or the stinging remorse from her heart, and now she sat there by the fire, with her thin hands clasped, and fingering, with her poor little Ben's faded and frightened, and creeping away to kiss her again."

strange, terrible feeling came over him, an indescribable presence of something to come.

"Mother!" he called, gently, sitting up in his bed. "Oh, mother! what is it? I can't tell, but I feel something; indeed I do, mother!"

But she did not heed him. The old sea-dog lifted his pointed ears and listened intently; then he arose, and pattered across to the child's bed, with a look half-human in his eyes.

"What is it, Triton?" he whispered. The dog listened again, then he bounded to the door, and began to scratch and sniff beneath it.

"Oh, mother! mother!" called Bessie, in amazed fright. She arose with trembling hands and a death-white face.

"Why, my boy, my darling," she whispered; then she went to the door and opened it.

Triton stood an instant with his ears erect and his nose to the ground; then he shot off, making great, flying leaps, and uttering short, excited cries.

Through the wild, dark night she went, down to the beach, say cliffs, and then, standing upon the isolated sands, his black hairy figure sharply defined against the pale, winter sky, she saw the form of a man, with Triton leaping and barking around him; and never pausing, never stopping to question or wonder, but impelled by the wild instinct, she flew on until she fell breathless and senseless at his feet.

When she awoke to life again she was in the cottage, lying on Bessie's little bed, and Ben, sobbing like a woman, gathered her up in his strong arms, kissing her lips wildly, as she clung to him like child.

Yes, there he stood, bronzed and worn, and changed, but with the same honest, kindly eyes. Ben Chudleigh, her own husband. He held out his arms, but she would not protrude at his feet.

"Oh, Ben! Oh, my husband! my darling! forgive me! I know that God has, because He has given you back to me."
