He came into the room, and I immediately stepped up to him, and taking him by the hand, said, "is it possible! Can this be Edward Marsden?"

He blushed until the blood dyed his swarthy, unshaven cheeks a deep red, stammered confusedly, and at length said, "it is; and you are Doctor—— I saw you yesterday and recognized you; but for reasons you may well imagine avoided you."

"But how in the name of wonder do I see you thus? Surely a man of your talents and acquirements, however reduced."

In the set as crime.

At length the old gentleman was somewhat mollified. "The fellow," he said, "after the first three weeks, began to show symptoms of drinking, and the day before yesterday I found, on watching him, that small sums of money which for some time past have been missing from the till, were taken by him and spent in the indulgence of his bestial propensities; but for my respect for you I would have caused him to be arrested. As it is, I have discharged lim, and that without his wages."

see you thus? Surely a man of your ta-lents and acquirements, however reduced he might become by the fluctuations of fortune, should rise again to a more con-fortune, should rise again to a more congenial position than that in which I now find you?"

"Fallen in fortune! Rise again!" he replied, while a sardonic sneer overspread his features and gave a shockingly smister expression to his countenance, which was seared by the lines marked by intemperance and recklessness now grown habitual.

"Rise again! How can a man rise again when he has lost character, caste, his good name and fame, the sympathy of his friends—all, everything! How can a man rise again when the powers of heaven, earth and hell have conspired to crush him, and Spectacles to suit all sights.

him yet many years of life and comparative health, for he was still a young man; and when he was able to apply himself to business, I got him a situation as clerk in a store. For some weeks he was all that I ould have desired; but his vices were con-titutional, and should have been cowected in early youth. I found I might as well attempt to train the growth of the gnarles oak as to turn him from the evil tenor of his ways. Those which at first had been mere renial faults, which might have been surbed if not entirely eradicated, had now become habitual vices; and his spendthrift habits, only sins against himself when had the means of gratifying them, had now assumed such permanency that to indulge-them he scrupled not to resort to crime. He had been about six weeks in his new ployment, when one evening a ring at door bell brought the footman into the rlor, for at that time I had arrived at the gnity of keeping a man servant.
"If you please sir, a parson wishes to see a privately," said the servant. "Who or what is he?" said I. "He would not give his name, sir, and ppears highly excited. I think he is ther drunk or mad," was the reply. I was somewhat doubtful as to the propriety of seeing this man, but at length I came to the conclusion that I would do so, and I directed the servant to show him into private apartment, whether I followed im. My visitor was Edward Marsden, and I was deeply grieved to see that he was in a state of intoxication, not so much so, however, as to confuse his ideas; but he so, however, as to confuse his ideas; but ne was excited in a very hish degree.

"Well, James," he said, as soon as I had closed the door, "this is the way in which I thank you for your kindness. You know the old proverb—-'Set a beggar on horseback," &c.
