TUESDAY MORNING, JULY 13.

New Brunswick Dry.

The prohibitionists scored a victory in New Brunswick last Saturday comparable with their victory in Ontario last fall. The provincial prohibition law was sustained at the polls by a two to one vote, and light wine and beer proposals were voted down by a large majority. This leaves New Brunswick in the dry column and she may become bone dry when a referendum is taken under the Scott act, such as we are to have in Ontario next October. Prohibition has been preached, but not always practiced in New Brunswick. Many of her public men received their oratorical training in the temperance lodges, and a certain tendency to exhort was often discernible in the speeches of New Brunswick members of parliament. Yet abolishing the bar did not at once abolish the drink evil if we are to rely upon the national test which assumed that a New Brunswicker always carried a corkscrew in his pocket.

For years in spite of the laws to the contrary, there were a number of open bars in New Brunswick and in some places the offending hotelkeeper was periodically arrested and fined and thus made to pay a sort of a license. At present, however, the provincial law is enforced, and the vote last Saturday indicates that the prohibition sentiment is steadily growing. The wine and beer proposals were defeated in industrial and Acedian centres, where the wets had counted on victory.

The Mills of God.

The late Empress Eugenie lived to learn more clearly than most people the force of the saying "Count no man happy until he is dead." Hurling from a throne into exile, the empress drank deep of sorrow, the climax of her troubles coming with the ill-fated death of the prince imperial. On the other hand she lived to see her enemies and the enemies of her country humbled to the dust. France has redeemed Sedan, has retaken Alsace-Lorraine, the German empire is a thing of the past, and the German emperor is a fugitive and an outcast.

If the empress had been given absolute power after the Franco-Prussian war she could not have wreaked upon the victorious Prussians any vengeance comparable with what Fate, without her assistance, had in store for them. Bismarck was publicly humiliated and dismissed from office, the crown prince met a tragic and harrowing death, the German empire was not only overthrown, but the German people, after passing through the decimating war to defeat, seemed destined to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the next half century. No one in 1913 could have imagined the abyss into which Germany was about to fall and no one in 1913 could have imagined how France was to be humiliated and the throne of Louis Napoleon to crumble.

So much trouble comes to every one who lives long enough that his worst enemy is likely to have his desire for revenge more than satisfied. And this leads to a popular and somewhat dangerous impression. Some men, perhaps a criminal or a condemned murderer, undertakes to pronounce a curse upon the judge, jury and officials who brought him to justice. Then as death and misfortune overtake these officials there is a maudlin tendency to attach importance to the ravings of the condemned criminal.

Will There Be a Third Party?

It is hard at this distance to forecast the result of the conventions being held in Chicago, which have as their object the formation of a third political party in the United States. There is first, the convention called by the Committee of Forty-Eight, a more or less self-appointed committee, representing the forty-eight states of the union. This committee has a short platform calling for nationalization of natural resources and transportation. Then there is the Labor party, which assembled yesterday. In Chicago also are groups representing the Farmers, Non-Partisan League, the Single-Taxers, and the "American Constitutional party," which, we suspect, from the prominence given to it by The New York American, is the favorite child of William Randolph Hearst.

The effort at Chicago will be to consolidate these conventions and groups into a new political party, much as the old-line Whigs, the Free-Soilers and the Know-Nothings were amalgamated to form the Republican party in 1856. They hope, at least, to unite on the same presidential candidate, and to make things warm for both the Republican and Democratic parties at the November election. The personality of the candidate will out more figure than the party platform, and a boom has been launched for Henry Ford. Senator LaFollette is also prominently mentioned, but says he will not accept unless the third party is going to be a permanent organization.

In his keynote speech at the Committee of Forty-Eight convention on Saturday last, Allen McCurdy, its secretary, declared that he favored the two-party system, but denied that any such system at present existed in the United States. The Republican and Democratic parties, he declared to be the two wings of a bird of prey. There was no national issue upon which they were divided, and, in order to stage their quadrennial sham battle, they had to invent an issue based on international relations. There was nothing, he said, in either party platform which might not have been adopted without discussion or dissent by a convention of corporation lawyers or Wall street bankers.

The two-party system is based upon that quality of human nature which disposes a number of people to caution, and a correspondingly large number of other people to experiment. The individual voter changes in temperament with age and experience, so that the radical youth may become a conservative old man. And the community as a whole will unaccountably veer at times from radicalism to reaction, and vice versa. No matter how you start the two-party system, you will sooner or later find many conservatives within the tents of conservatism.

It may be embarrassed by freaks and faddists, but it may none the less appear to a large section of the electorate who have lost faith in the old parties. A lot of queer fish will be caught in the third party net at Chicago. But there may be a substantial public opinion back of the movement which is not to be underrated, especially if, they hitch up with a reputable candidate.

OTHER PEOPLE'S OPINIONS

VETERANS TO HOLD A MASS MEETING

J. Harry Flynn, chieftain of the G. A. U. V., returns to Toronto on Friday evening, and at half-past seven a mass meeting is to be held at Queen's Park to welcome him back. This mass meeting will be important in that it will give an idea of the solidarity of such there be, of the united forces of the returned men in this city. In some quarters there is already unity of sentiment between the G. W. V. A. and the G. A. U. V., and hope is expressed in many quarters that this will spread to Toronto, and that in due course the two organizations will fuse in sentiment throughout the province. Questions of political moment will be taken up at the mass meeting, and the national Conservative and Liberal government under the leadership of Arthur Meighen will receive consideration.

CHAMPIONS IN COMBAT.

NEW UNION STATION READY WITHIN YEAR

Mayor Church Tells of Temporary Scheme For the Operation of Trains.

There does not seem to be any possibility of the new Union Station being used for at least a year. E. L. Cousins, general manager of the harbor commission, was asked yesterday as to the likelihood of the depot being utilized by Exhibition time in the event of the low level construction being adopted and remarked that even if the work was started at once there was not even the slightest chance that the depot would be ready within twelve months.

According to Mayor Church, the sub-committee having the matter of the new Union Station in hand will probably recommend that the city agree to an order for the temporary operation of trains into and out of the new Union Station on the lower level, providing the railway companies give an earnest intimation of their intentions to proceed with the construction of the viaduct by purchasing the right-of-way.

Plans of Commission. "The harbor commission's plans," added the mayor, "have been based on the building of the hot, and it would stand to lose millions unless the viaduct is built. It is not the intention of the committee to recede from that order, but owing to the high cost of construction today we are willing to recommend that the city agree to temporary operation on the level, provided the companies buy the right of way. We hope to have our report ready for the board of control in a few days."

DEMAND ALL CARS DURING RUSH HOURS

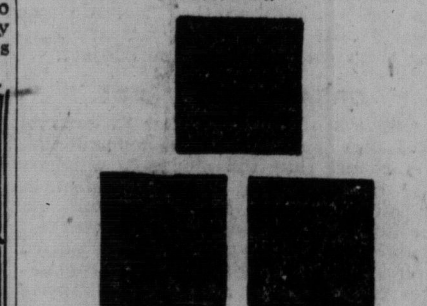

Mayor Church stated yesterday that he had instructed the city solicitor to proceed against the T.S.R. to compel it to place all its cars in operation during the rush hours. His worship has taken this action following a recent report of Works Commissioner Harris of the number of cars in operation and in the barns during both morning and evening rush hours.

WORLD'S DAILY BRAIN TEST

BY SAM LOYD.
30 Minutes to Answer This.
No. 244.

As is apparent, four similar squares can be combined to form one large square, but it is a different matter when we tackle the proposition of combining three similar squares to produce a single larger square. So we will ask our puzzlers to dissect those three squares into the fewest possible number of pieces which can be fitted together to form one large square.

Answer to No. 243.
The average speed for the first two hours was 67 1/2 miles per hour, for the last two hours, 52 miles. Difference, 15 1/2 miles in two hours, or 7 3/4 miles in one hour.

Hence the distance accomplished in the first hour was 71 1/4 miles, in the second hour, 56 1/2 miles, and in the third hour, 48 1/2 miles.

JUDITH OF BLUE LAKE RANCH

By JACKSON GREGORY.

He didn't look up. His fingers, busy with the string at Crowdy's belt, brought away the canvas bag. There was blood on it; it was heavy and gave forth the mellow jangle of gold.

"You wip back your thousand on to-night's play," he said, holding up the bag to Judith, lifting his eyes to her face.

But Judith shrank back; her eyes wide with horror.

"I don't want it! I can never touch it!" she whispered.

Suddenly she was, shaking from head to foot, her eyes fixed in terrible fascination upon Crowdy's face. Lee tossed the bag to the bunk across the room, whence it fell clanking to the floor.

"Now she's going to faint," was his thought. "Well, I won't blame her so damn much. Poor little kid!"

But he did not look at her again. He tore away Crowdy's shirt to discover just how serious the wound in the chest was. The collar-bone had been broken; the ball had plowed its way thru the upper chest, well above the heart, and could be felt under the skin of the shoulder. Unless Bill Crowdy bled to death, he stood an excellent chance of doing time in the penitentiary. Lee stanchied the flow of blood, made a rude bandage, and then, lifting the body gently, carried it to the bunk. Crowdy's lax arm, extended downward at the side of the bunk, seemed to be reaching again for the canvas bag; the red fingers touched it with their tips.

"Now," said Lee, speaking bluntly, afraid that a tone of sympathy might merely aid the girl to "shake to pieces," "we've got a chance to be on our way before Number Two and Number Three get into the game. Let's run for it, Judith."

Judith went to the bench by the fireplace and sank down upon it. For a moment she made no reply. Then she shook her head.

"We'll stay here until morning," she said, finally, her voice surprising Lee, who had looked for a sign of weakness to accord with her sudden pallor and visible trembling.

"What for?" he wanted to know. "We'll have another fight on our hands if we do. Those fellows this deep in it are not going to quit while they know that there's all that money in the shack!"

"I don't care," said Judith firmly. "I won't run from them or anybody else I know! And, besides, Bud Lee, I am not going to give them the chance to get Crowdy away. . . . Do you think he is going to die?"

"No, I don't. Doc Tripp will fix him up."

"Then here I stay. When I go, Bill Crowdy goes with me! He's going to talk, and he's going to help me send Bayne Trevors to the penitentiary."

Bud Lee expressed all he had to say in a silent whistle. He'd made another mistake, that was all. Judith wasn't going to faint for him tonight.

"Then," he said presently, setting her the example, "slip some fresh cartridges into your rifle and get ready for more shooting. I'll put out the light and we'll wait for what's next."

Judith replenished the magazine of her rifle. Lee, watching from under the low-drawn brim of his hat, noted that her fingers were steady now. Crowdy moved on his bunk, lifted a hand weakly, groaned, and grunted. Presently he stirred again, and weakly for water.

Lee went to the water bucket standing in a corner, it happened to be half full. He filled a cup, and lifted Crowdy's head, held it to the water lips.

"Not exactly what you'd call fresh, is it, Crowdy?" he said lightly. "The spring's outside and I'm scared to go out in the dark."

Crowdy drank thirstily and lay back, his eyes closed again. Lee rearranged his bandage.

"Put out the light now!" he said to Judith.

"No," she answered. "What's the use? There are no holes in the walls; they could stalk a gun-barrel there."

No one knew better than he that there were not.

"You see," said Judith, with a smile, heroically assumed, "I'm a little afraid of the dark, too. Anyway, we've got to spend the night with him in Crowdy's shape. It's more cozy, won't it, with the light on?"

She even put out her hand to one of the books on the shelves which she could reach from her bench.

"And now," she added, "you see that our hermit won't mind if we go into his library, will he?"

"No," answered Lee gravely, "I think he'll be proud."

Lee found time to muse that there made of incongruities, woman of the inconsistencies. Here with a badger man lying ten feet from her, and every likelihood of the night being ripped in two by a ride on Judith's sat and turned the pages of a book. It was a volume on the breeding and care of pure-blooded horses. Odd sort of thing for her to have.

Have brought here with him. Lee had taken down another volume. Horses again; a treatise by an eminent authority upon a newly imported line from Arabia. A third book, a volume of Elizabethan lyrics. Lee flushed as he watched her. She turned the pages slowly, came to the fly-leaf page, read the name scrawled there and, turning swiftly to Lee, said accusingly:

"David Burrill Lee, you are a humbug!"

"Wrong again," grinned Lee. "I'm a man with a soul."

"Scat!" answered Judith. But under Bud Lee's teasing eyes, the color began to come back into her cheeks. He had been a wee bit enthusiastic over her hermit, making of him a phantasmic ideal. She had visioned him, even to the calm eyes, gentle voice. A quick little frown touched her brow as she realized that the eyes and voice of Bud Lee, but he had called him a dear. And Lee had been laughing at her all the time.

He told her. The thought came to her she would like to slap Bud Lee's face for him. And she had told Tripp she would like to slap Pollock Hampton. Good and hard!
