LUMBER AT CHIPMAN BURNED
Fire on Friday destroyed the lumber out of Archie Wiley at his mill at Chipman. The loss is estimated at between $4,000 and $5,000 and there is little or no insurance. Some of the lumber was owned by C. G. Baird and Samuel Baird, who formerly conducted the mill. C. G. Baird said that his loss would probably reach $4,000. The mill building, as far as known, was saved.

TO BE MARRIED

A 50 P. C. DIVIDEND

New York, Sept. 20.—C. W. Nash, president of the General Motors Company, in a statement given out here, said the report that the company had been able to declare a 50 per cent dividend on its common stock, chiefly by reason of a large business in war supplies, was correct. The English company has sold something like 200 automobiles to be used for Red Cross ambulances. The policy of the company has been to build up home business, not to cater to war orders.

SOUTH FOR HEALTH

Mrs. Elmer A. Young of West St. John, accompanied by her daughter, Miss Mamie Young, will leave this evening on a trip to the south for her health. They will be the guests of Mrs. Young's brother, W. E. Mullin, formerly of this city, in Louisville, Ky., and intend to remain there for some months. Her friends will hope that Mrs. Young may return home greatly improved in health.

MASSACRE OF THE CHRISTIANS

Grim Story Told By Priest In Armenia

THE TURKISH "HOLY WAR"

An Appealing Message to The Civilized World and a Shocking Revelation—Substantiated by Missionaries and Russian Consul

The account of Rev. Father Dakras, of the Catholic mission in Harsova, Armenia, describing the brutal massacre of Christians by the Turks, contains an appealing message to the civilized world and a shocking revelation. It is entirely substantiated by the Presbyterian Board of Missions and the Russian consul at Harsova and was sent by the British and Foreign Press Association for publicity. Father Dakras who had his left eye cut in two and his cheek torn by a barbarian's sword, says:

"With the withdrawal of the Russian army from the Urmi district, as from Hell's gates sailed forth the savage Moslems of Anatolia, the barbarous Kurdish hordes and semi-human Bedouin Arabs from the region of Mesopotamia. The oldest Christian race in the world is being slaughtered by these Moslem fanatics and the war of extermination is not yet over. I could not have brought myself, even by the wildest stretch of imagination to fancy that human beings would or could behave so towards their fellow men."

An Affrighting Orgy

"Through the last few months—horrible and indescribable mental and physical agony, my mind is so petrified with bitter sadness that I still feel dazed. Although far away in the stronghold of mighty Russia's southern empire, here in Tiflis, I still have an innate fear of the beastly hordes who are ravaging my beloved Palestine beyond the snow-capped Caucasus Mountains. I still hear the shrieking voices of innocent children and the horror-stricken cries of men and women, old and young. Oh, it is like hell let loose without a minute's respite! I still see them; still hear them. It was an orgy. It was like a night mare, in which poor, weak and infirm human beings groped with the demons of other regions."

"If the Christians of the western world would only recognize how thousands of times unholy is this Moslem Holy War! For the last ten years the Turks have been busy committing religious persecution in the name of Islam, inciting the Moslem Kurds against the Christians of the Province of Anabekian and the Urmi Lake District which borders on the Russo-Turkish frontier junction."

"Some time before the outbreak of the present war the Russian troops had occupied the northern portion of the province as far as a few miles north of the city of Urmi. Since the recent Persian Constitutional revolution, Russia has kept some troops in this territory, and immediately on the outbreak of the European war both Russia and Turkey were actually violating Persian territory. Russia was afraid of a Turkish raid through this strip, neither was that government's fear of Turkey unjustified, as the Persian government had no authority over the district."

Russians Came Down

"Early in November two Russian armies crossed this strip, one through Kotur and another through Khanouk passes which are about 85 to 40 miles distant from one another and drove the Turkish troops well into their own country. Early in December the Turks returned heavily reinforced, engaged the Russians and were again defeated, retreating to wards Van. A powerful Turkish army formed further south, of Kurdish and Bedouin mounted troops, was about to flank the Russian armies when suddenly the Russian troops withdrew beyond Tabriz. This was early in January and the Moslem hordes poured into the evacuated regions. From January 1 to 30 until the Russian detachment routed the Moslem fanatics at Sufyan and re-entered Tabriz, tens of thousands of Christians were butchered, and thousands of others who succeeded in escaping the Moslem sword, perished through the cold, hunger or famine."

"No sooner had the ill-fated Christians observed the retreating Russian troops than they became horror-struck. Every Christian hastily snatched whatever he could possibly carry and started on the tracks of the retreating Muscovite troops towards the north. On Jan. 2 the sad emigration was augmented, until the ill-fated multitude covered every inch of the district of the north. Against the snow-clad Caucasus Mountains the suffering humanity looked like a great expanse of black water splashing against the crests of the frozen hills-top."

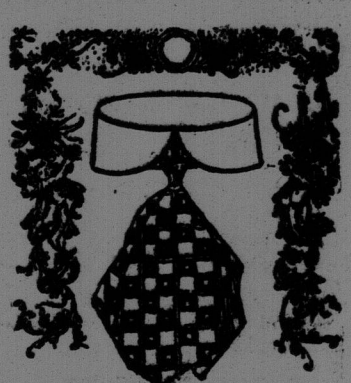

"Senseless and soulless little children, lashed to the backs of their frantic mothers, whose bare feet danced over the snow-covered fields; their scanty household utensils dangling from the backs of the grown-ups, babies in pain with cold, children hungry, scared and shivering; old men and women leaning against their sticks and carrying burdens that ordinarily would have crushed the youths; young women who had purposely disguised themselves from the fear of falling into the hands of the savage Kurds; these and many other terrible scenes rendered this plight of the Eastern Christians the most pitiful of all its long history of agony for their faith."

"By this time the savage Moslem, Kurds and Bedouins on horseback had already entered the city. They waved their crescent-shaped swords and moved down innocent men, women and even infants. They gathered around units of panic-stricken Christians, who were unarmed, and drove them into oil wells. These wells, filled with humanity, were guarded while other Moslems dashed to the already deserted houses, producing kerosene oil and poured it into the wells."

Burned Alive

"On January 4, no fewer than fourteen wells were thus filled, at landra, near the city of Urmi, and simultaneously they were set on fire—the Moslems sitting around looking on. O, God! I can still hear those shrieks. The tormentors watched the work of their demon acts with serene satisfaction. This is Holy War; it still haunts me."

"At Diaz, about twenty miles south of Urmi, the Kurds buried more than 800 Christians to their claims. The illlowing day many of these had already died, but still quite a number of them were half alive. On January 6, when the main Bedouin troops arrived from the south, they rode over the skulls of these buried Christians.

"The Persian Christians, known as the Nestorians, fell victims to the Moslem sword throughout the entire northwestern section of Persia, while the Christian population of the whole of Armenia, the southwestern section of Trans-Caucasia and the Mesopotamian District, are today the living witnesses of the Holy War. The Roman Catholic church, the school, the mission property and the little House of Mercy are desolate heaps of black mud and brick, here and there a charred body protruding from between the burnt wood and stone.

Pillagers, Not Soldiers

"Instead of following the Russian armies, who had left the Urmi District about the first day of January, the Ottoman armies were busily engaged robbing and pillaging the surrounding country and murdering its people. During the entire month of January they pillaged, plundered and murdered until the return of the Russian detachments, mostly Georgians and Armenians, who recaptured Tabriz on January 8.

"From Urmi to Tiflis is 200 miles by road, through the mountain crests covered with many feet of snow. These roads today bear witness to the most gruesome tragedies perpetrated by the Moslems in the name of Holy War. Those of us who were fortunate enough to reach the Russian frontier, after a seventy-five mile journey on foot, received relief from the Russian authorities."

At Jaffa those of us who were in charge of food distribution were practically mobbed. Hardly two-thirds of those who had started from the Armenian district were able to reach the Russian frontier. Even at this time the massacre is not ended. Day and night streams of Christian refugees from Armenia are pouring into every Russian border town and city."

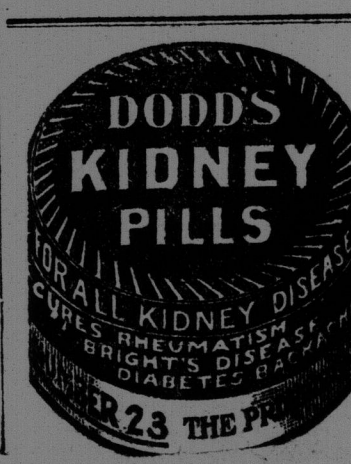

The whole of Armenia, from the shores of the Black Sea to the shores of the Mediterranean is a vast graveyard, ruined and desolate."

STORY OF PRINCE OF WALES

One of the many stories told about the Prince of Wales at the front is being related in London. It seems that the prince continually is imploring Sir John French to permit him to go into the first line trenches, but the wise field marshal, knowing how much depends on the preservation of the life of the heir to the throne, has refused all requests. During the height of the fighting at Festubert the prince again pleaded with the field marshal to permit him to join the fighters and when the answer was a courteous "No, sir," the heir apparent retired with gloomy face to the society of his comrades on the staff and said, when they chaffed him over his failure:

"Oh, it's all right for you fellows to have your joke, but I tell you it is not fun to be a prince!"

Although the prince is not permitted to expose himself needlessly, it must not be thought that he has not been under fire. As a matter of fact, he has heard the "black Johnsons" whistling close at hand.
