A Bright World.

Some say this world is a cold, cold world. But it's always been bright to me.

With its heart-throbbing joys and warm desires 'Tis the things that are yet to be.

And I must leave it to you to see. And trust in the faith I have seen.

For I know there is truth in the promise of youth.

I shall some time come to my own. Some say this world is a dark, dark world, but it's always been bright to me.

A Signal of Distress.

During the summer of 1898 I was spending my three months college vacation on the cattle ranch of an uncle in the Big Chippewa River country of western South Dakota.

I was there not merely for pleasure and the relaxation from a hard year of study which the visit afforded, but also to try the effect of the dry, pure air on a chronic lung trouble with which I was affected.

The ranch was not a large one, and the round-up only amounted to about three hundred head of beef cattle, for my uncle had but recently moved from the eastern part of the state to undertake Indian reservation lands, and was not yet sure that the experiment would prove successful.

The ranch lay on the north side of the Big Chippewa River, and a few hundred feet to the west of the house and out-buildings a large creek made down from the northwest, bordered by steep banks to within a short distance of its junction with the Chippewa, when they spread out and merged with the river bluff. This creek was generally dry in the summer, and during seasons of prolonged drought even the river itself sometimes became so low as to amount to hardly more than a brook.

East of the buildings, a strong barb-wire fence ran northwest from the river bank over the bluff, and after paralleling the creek for a short distance on the upland, turned west to its edge. The fence included a tract of about twenty acres, which was used for corraling the stock when necessary, though usually the herd grazed on the open prairie to the northward, guarded by four cowboys, of whom I was one.

My uncle's family consisted only of his wife and himself and their sixteen-year-old son, Charlie, who was so unfortunate as to have a deformed foot. I soon learned to think a great deal of this young cousin of mine, who, in spite of the fact that his deformity and general ill health forbade his sharing in the ordinary business and pleasures of the ranch, was an insatiable reader, a keen observer, and a most entertaining and pleasant companion. He spent his time around the house and corral, and I rarely saw him except at morning and evening, when I was in from the herd for meals. But at those times we found much to talk about. He would question me eagerly concerning my college life, for he expected before long to begin his own university course. For the rest, he often asked my advice and help about the work in which he was engaged, for he possessed a good deal of inventive talent and was always experimenting with various mechanical devices, which often proved useful around the place.

In May, shortly before my arrival, Charlie had spent several days with his father in Chicago, and had there seen, for the first time, flying high over the city, the box kites then recently invented. His fertile brain was immediately inspired with the idea of turning them to practical use on the ranch, and he purchased one. At the time of his visit to Chicago, public attention was concentrated on the Spanish-American war, and from reading of the operations of the United States fleets in the Gulf of Mexico, he also became interested in the naval system of signaling, and carried a code-book home with him. Shortly after my arrival he untold his plan to me. One morning while out on the prairie I had noticed a box kite flying over the buildings, and that night I asked him what it meant.

"One use," he said, with the enthusiasm which always lighted his face when such matters were under discussion, "father and the boys use them all out on the ranch and nobody left here but mother and myself. Now there's always a good deal of stock around the barns and corral, and it's always a chance that some thing may happen which mother and I can't handle. A steer may get along in the fence, or there may be a fire or some other common business. What I want to do is to fix up a system of signaling to let the men know if they are needed at the house. And I believe I have done it with my kite. I can tell her anything I want to."

"Well," I said, a little dubiously, "that's all right for a general signal, but I don't see how you're going to keep any special information with a kite."

"Wait a minute," he cried, and disappeared in his room. He returned with the great oblong object in his hands.

"See that little pulley?" he asked, pointing to the lower framework of the kite. "and the fish line through it? I get my kite up, anchor it, and then fasten the signal flags of the Maine Code, for whatever message I want to send, to the fish-line, and draw them up to the kite. They can be seen and read from any part of the ranch."

"The boys don't know the code," I said. "They couldn't read the signals even though they saw them."

"It is very easily learned," he answered confidently. "and I believe would be well worth the trouble."

My uncle had listened attentively to the conversation, but at the close he smiled doubtfully. "Charlie," he said, "you've invented gate latches and feeding racks and any number of other useful things, and the idea of this is all right too. But I don't believe there will ever be very many occasions for putting it to practical use."

"Well, of course, I don't know as to that," said Charlie, "but I believe I can make it useful."

And as he was a universal favorite, the cowboys gratified him by spending a few hours in memorizing the code, which was as far as the matter went for the time.

In the latter part of July, the grass began to dry up on the prairie, and by the middle of August, owing to an unusually protracted drought and hot south winds, it became so shriveled that sufficient feed for the herd could not be found within many miles of the ranch. My uncle made a trip to the nearest shipping point on the Missouri River, and, finding that the Chicago cattle market was high, determined to dispose of his animals while they were still in good condition. So the third week in August he drove the herd away, accompanied by three of the cowboys. As I was a relative he left me to take charge of the ranch during his absence.

The work I had to do was light and Gensley milk cows which were kept constantly in the corral and fed on green hay and mash. The care of these and of the sixteen horses, which I usually herded on the prairie during the day, constituted practically all my work and Charlie helped me a great deal about the lighter part of it.

One extremely warm afternoon, about a week after the herd had been taken away, I was sitting on a rock on the prairie about three miles distance from the house, with my saddle animal picketed near by and the horses grazing quietly over the adjacent hill sides. I was wishing heartily that a good rain might come to break the oppressive heat; and my wish was not without hope, for along the northwestern horizon lay a low, dark bank of clouds which had risen within the hour and which seemed to indicate a heavy thunder storm in that direction. The rest of the sky, however, was perfectly cloudless, and the sun beat down with unobstructed fervor. Even the snap and whirl of the grass-hoppers came infrequently, and the contented crunch of the horses as they nibbled the short-hair grass was the only sound that broke the majestic silence of the vast, rolling plain. Presently, as I sat despite the heat, enjoying in a languid sort of a way the peace and simple beauty of my surroundings, I noticed my horse suddenly lift his head and with pricked ears gaze steadily in the direction of the distant dry creek bed which ran past the ranch. The action in itself was not unusual, but the startled look in his eyes and the

As the hum of approval went around, a seasoned little juror said: "I heard that Pike guy' it out that strain on the nerves, the blood becomes impoverished, the cheeks pale, the blood becomes impoverished, there are frequent headaches, palpitations of the heart and a constant tiredness. If the first symptoms are neglected it may lead to a complete breakdown--perhaps consumption. What is needed to restore vim and energy and vitality is a tonic, and absolutely the best tonic in the world is Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. These actually make new blood, and bring health and cheerful energy to tired and depressed girls and women.

Miss Viola Millett, Robinson's Corners, N. S., says: "I was a great sufferer from headaches, heart palpitations and troubles that afflict my sex. My blood seemed almost to have turned to water, and the least exertion left me weak and depressed. I used seven boxes of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and they have made a remarkable change in my condition. I can truly say that I feel like a new person, and I strongly recommend these pills to all weak, ailing girls."

These pills cure all forms of blood and nerve troubles, but you must get the genuine with the full name Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People on the wrapper around each box. Ask your druggist for them or you can get them by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 by writing the Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

It is rapidly growing upon the most thoughtful Americans that the vacation should be utilized in teaching boys and girls to work in some out of door or manual employment that will not tax the mind along the school year line, but shall really be more restful than idleness. -N.
