seen nothing more remarkable than a tall good-looking gentleman, aged thirty-nine, engaged in the act of shaving.

Nevertheless, there was something noteworthy in that sung little ante-chamber, albeit the aforesaid pair of curioucyes would have been unable to see it.—Herbert Pinniger, the gentleman who was so detity using his razor, possessed, in common with other ladies and gentlemen, a certain pestilent piece of property called a Conscience. This Conscience had, like many others of the human race, kept carefully bottled up out of harm's way. But, for some occult reason, on this special Christmas morning the Pinniger Conscience became restless. His restlessness grew and grew, till at length he burst the seals which held him in, and issued forth, terrible and gigantic, like the Genii in the Eastern story of the Fisherman. Then, without a word of apology, he thus addressed his owner:

'Let us strike a balance between your good deeds are soon summed up. Six five-pound notes sent to the poor-boxes of as many police-courts; in itself a praiseworthy act, yet causing no self denial to a man with fifty thousand pounds securely invested. Now for your evil deeds. Did you not persistently fan the flaue of your father's anger against your elder brother John, when he married the Vicar's penniless claughter, so that he left him only £500, and you the residue of which lighted you to fortune; you made a clear £30,000, while he, but for his wife's settlement, would be penniless. Of course you could not afford to marry I woman without a fortune, but you counningly contrived to let your affection cool so gradually that poor Ada never knew the exact moment when Love faded into Indifference, and—such is the generosity of a woman who loves—she somehow managed to blame herself for the blight that fell on her young life. Now for some more of your scurvy deecs—

But just then Snead, discreetest of valets, entered, demanding instructions concerning breakfast. A desperate struggle, invisible to the eyes of Snead, ensued, and then the mighty giant was once more reduced to petty dimensions, and forced to re-enter his prison house.

Seated at the trim breakfast-table, with cheerful gaslights overhead to counteract the fog, and Snead, noiseless and dexterous, hovering around, ministering to his wants, Mr. Pinniger looked so severe, his spotless linen and well cut.

'Take it away, Snead,' said his master is all the pencil of a skilled artist to do justice to Mr. Snead's face as he cautiously drewforth the carcass of a large black cat which had evidently been deceased for nany days, and round whose neck a label was tied bearing the following incription:—

'A seasonable gift for Mr. H. Pinniger. May he receive many such. He deserves them.'

Snead's face was, as aforesaid, a study for a painter. Chastened wrath, with a dignified compassion, for the employer who had thus been slighted, were there safely ensconed in his pantry; this discretest of valets sniggered over the coarse practical joke is a matter with which this history need not concern it self. The only words he uttered were:—

'It's downright insultin'.'

'Take it away, Snead,' said his master is calmly, 'but preserve the hamper, the address card and the label. They may

'Any letters, Snead?' demanded Mr.

'Take it away, Snead,' said his master J calmly, 'but preserve the hamper, the address card and the label They may be useful as a clue to identification.'

Snead went away feeling really humisliated. Coming upstairs he believed that he was carrying a gift worthy of a prince, now he knew that he was carrying down stairs a repulsive piece of carrior. 'Any letters, Snead?' demanded Mr. Pinniger, after he had despatched an egg, a rasher of delicately flavored bacon, and

As soon as he had left the room Pinni ger rose softly and locked the door. Then he seated himself at the table, burying He made it a rule never to open letters until he had eaten part of his breakfast. If the news conveyed in them was pleasant, it could wait; if unpleasant, it must not be suffered to derange his appetite."

Snead handed to his employer three latters on a tray.

He seated himself at the table, burying his head in his hands. When he uncovered his face his eyelids were red, and there was a visible moisture on his cheeks. The strong stern man had evidently shed tears.

'God help me!' he murmured. 'I have not a friend in the world. Every one help me and I deserve to be hated.'

one hates me and I deserve to be hated.

After a while he became calmer, and Before opening them, Mr. Pinniger said, 'Where's the Times?' Before opening them, Mr. Pinniger said, 'Where's the Times?'

'Not come yet, sir,' replied Snead.—
'Bein' Christmas Day, I presume the newsboy is dishorganized.'

'Confound Christmas Day!' muttered his master. 'You needn't wait, Snead. And then proceeded to open his letters.

They were not precisely the sort of merrical and interest of the sort of merrical of our ledger belances serves in And then proceeded to open his letters.

They were not precisely the sort of letters which most of us would care to receive on Christmas morning, when the joy-bells were welcoming the Birthday of the Child who came bearing a message of Peace from Heaven to Earth. But then business is business, and Mr. Pinniger's business produced letters which were not always of an agreeable character. Mr. Pinniger was not a professed money lender, but he was fond of all kinds of speculation, and, among other speculations, he now and then leut money.

I expected to get, I should have been lazy to the end of the chapter. Whereas, being urged on by Poverty and Love, I took to hard work, and I've thriven on it. Poer old dad did me a right down good turn when he left me $600., and no more. It just served to buy this partnership, and when Buckler, my senior partner, goes the way of all fiesh—he is close on eighty—I shall have the whole practice to my selt. So don't fear, Bertie, I can give you a helping hand now you are down on your luck.

'John, your words pierce my heart. I shall never forget this.'
'Tut-tut,' replied the Doctor, cheerily, 'But there is one thing, you do forget, namely, that this is Christmas Day, and that I am neglecting my guests in the dinning-room.'

True. Go back to them, and leave "What! Leave you alone on Christmas night! Never. But on second thoughts,' he added, in a graver tone, 'there might be an awkwardness in meeting some of the company. I cannot answer for other people's forgiveness.'

The first letter which he opened was written in pallid ink, and in that angular rather illegible hand which some thirty years ago was deemed the correct hand for ladies. It was very diffuse in style, and was actually crossed, an absolute crime in these days of cheap paper and cheap postage.
