Then they knew he was thinking of his little sister, Nancie, fancying he heard her singing from the water. Not a word was spoken. In silence the treatment of the properties of Not a word was spoken. But as a flash of light-ning makes dark night still more disma-by contrast, so did that poor face become sadder, when, with a look of pain and sorrow overspreading it, he burst into tears, fell back on the litter, and sobbed bitterly. They hurried him from the spot, and for the rest of the afternoon avoided falls and rapids whose sound had such a strange influence over him. Towards sunset preparations were made for comping for all were tired. The boy had an hour or two before fallen asleep, and in this state was placed direct-ly before the fire bolstered up a little so as to receive as nuch warmth as possible; but, from whatever cause, he presently awoke and opening his eyes beheld the fire crackling and flaming directly in front. A sudden shrick alarmed his companions, who rushing to his side found him wild with fright, trembling and holding out his feeble hands as if to 'shield himself from something terrible in front. Then they knew he was fancying himself again in the great fire, so at once they removed him some yards away but the poor child was already in convulsions. The limbs and body were rigid, the breathing ceased, the features were distorted, and the muscles of the lips and these twisted violents. throat twitched violently. In a little while the fit was over, leaving the child in a deep heavy slumber which continued for several hours. They didn't seek to wake him, but one by one kept patient watch at his side, seeing that he was warn and trusting he would be better for the sleep.

About ten o'clock a slight movement in the body attracted Duncan's notice, who bending down found the lad looking at him. Presently the head was moved from side to side as if trying to make out his surroundings, acting in all respects.

Just then a flas' of light from the fire shoue on the latter's face and to the delight and astonishment of all, the child muttered feebly—"Duncan whar is mith-er?" They were all kneeling around MICHITA him now, Jemmy was wetting his lips with warm tea, and addressing him by name, when the boy recognized him too by asking the same question: "Jemmy whar is mither?"

Making him however as comfortable as possible with all the wraps to be had the proposal was made to watch by turns, the others taking some rest of which all stood much in need; but to this Jemmy would not estent. He insisted on Sak and Dunean making a larger camp-fire some rods away and skeeping before it, leaving him to grand the boy a propestion to which they kindly agreed. Luckily for all the night was unusually warm for the time of year, a circumstance caused no doubt by the surrounding burnt waste radiating its superabundant heat into air, so that little discomfort was set by any even when the fires died was at by any even when the fires died

There was no mound to be heard save the low rippling murmur of the waters as they rolled on their compaliting course over a public. their complaining course over a pebbly bottom. On all sides was spread out the burnt waste, void of sound, movement, or life, rising here and there in black swells on the horizon like the burial mounds of a giant race. The faint crackling of the camp-fire, the distorted forms of burnt trees and stumps revealed momentarily by the flickering light and the low heavy breathing of the boy were the only signs of life to the long some watcher on the sand watcher on the sand.

For the greater pat of the afternoon, the child did not evince the leat interest in anything, in fax seemed unconscious of what was taking place around him until the sound of gurgling water proceeding from a rapid they were just passing, fell on the ear and recalled him to a state of dreamy consciousness.
