resque, ivy-clad, majestic ruin, from he summit of which fine views are o be had of the wild gorge botween he peaks of Torc and Glena; but its dilapidated condition renders any stempt at any ascent dangerous. The castle confers the title of Baron Ross on Lord Kenmare. It was ounded by the O'Donoghue, and ontinued to be for three hundred cars the residence of the prince of he Lakes, who derived from the astle the title of O'Donoghue of Ross. The old fortress was taken by General Ludlow, through the uperstitious fear of its defenders, who devoutly believed in an old cell tradition that Ross could not vithstand an attack by water. The Reneral, hearing of this, altered his actics, and manned his boats to titlek the castle from the lake, at which the besieged, as the story goes, terror-stricken, surrendered. To every point and object in this ovely environment there attaches ome quaint tradition of the Tononghue. Lough Leane, or the Lower Lake, like most other Irish akes, is of enchanted origin. A charmed fountain, which a willful O'Donoghue left open, sealed, in a single night, the fate of his city, his people, and his palaces. Next morning a populous city lay buried in the stretch of rolling waters. But death came not to the city or its inhabitants. At the bottom of the lake they exist in all their glory, and glimpses of the submerged city are often caught by the boatmen who will point out among the curiously formed rocks and numerous islands. O'Donoghue's library, his when on account of their fidelity to build and the promotion of their fidelity to be a populous city lay buried in the stretch of rolling waters. But death came not to the city or its inhabitants. At the boatmen who will point out among the curiously formed rocks and numerous lislands. about as much empressement and seemingly Herculcan goingson, as if they were navigating the Niagara Rapids. But then, Iroland is the theatre of great enthusiasm! The majestic scenery of the Upper Lake and of the Gap of Dunloe will be touched upon in a separate letter.—Shanid Aboo, in Toronto Catholic Review.

The Conversion of England.

LETTER FROM THE BISHOP OF SALFORD RECALLING REMARKABLE PROPHECIES.

The lord bishop of Salford has issued an appeal for prayers for the conversion of England, from which we make the following extracts:

THE DUTY OF ENGLISH CATHOLICS.

Catholics of this country have two obligations, two kinds of duty towards England, the one of the natural, the other of the supernatural order. By the first we are bound to be good subjects, loyal to the constitution, zealous for its improvement, ready to serve the commonwel, and to give our time, our pare, our substance and ourselves in its and movements, for instance, for the conversion of part of the world with admiration; whence it is defence. Thus, all good national movements, for instance, for the conversion of part of the world with admiration; whence it is defence.
