NOBODY HOME.

THE CARPENTER

Increased Mobility of the Human Race.

The 'Automobile' indicated three machines parked in front of an apartment house. "If it weren't for automobiles," he said, "do you realize that the majority of those people who are out visiting to-night would probably be in their own homes? Look up there," he pointed to several dark windows in the same apartment house, "those probably represent people who have gone off visiting someone else. It really is tremendous, when you think of it, the way the automobile has increased the mobility of the well known human race.

Fifteen years ago three quarters of these people who are in someone else's homes to-night would be in their own."

It is an interesting thought, isn't it?

And the next thought inevitably is,

does it represent an advantage

To my mind, it does and it doesn't.

The Restless Desire to Go Anywhere!

The other evening we were passing through a rather thickly settled residential part of the town at about 9 o'clock.

The usual number of machines were skimming by laden with people evidently bent on pleasure, and besides the moving machines there were a great many others parked here and there in front of homes or before moving picture houses.

I think he might also have added that he was selling her an enlarged circle of friends, for that is what the auto does for all of us.

One Can Come Nearer Making Congeniality the Test.

I don't mean necessarily adding new friends to one's list although, of course, it tends to do that too, but making it possible to get to so many of one's friends that were formerly inaccessible.

Everyone within a radius of 20 miles becomes one's neighbor, if one so wishes it. One may go to dine with them or even pay an evening call, whereas before one was limited to the people who were within walking distance or conveniently located on the trolley line, and often had to accept propinquity instead of congeniality as the standard of friendship.

Some cynic may add to my statement that everyone within a radius of 20 miles becomes one's neighbor if one wishes it; that sometimes when one's neighbor has the auto and one self stays at home, anyone within 20 miles becomes one's neighbor even when one does not wish it.

There is something in that, too.

Women Freemasons.

In spite of the ban of the Grand Lodge of England—the governing body of Freemasons in this country, of which the Duke of Connaught is Grand Master—Masonry is spreading among women. Numerous "Freemasons' lodges have been formed, in which membership is restricted to women, alho men may be introduced as visitors.

Do women know the genuine secrets of Free and Accepted Masonry?

They claim that they do. Grand Lodge says they do not, and will allow no regular Freemason to attend their gatherings under pain of expulsion from the craft.

They allege that while these so-called women Masons have got hold of part of the working and procedure that take place in properly constituted lodges, much of their ritual and many of their ceremonies are spurious.

In any case, their meetings are irregular and unauthorized. The genuine secrets have been well guarded, and no Mason could divulge them without violating his most solemn oath and obligation and rendering himself liable to the severest penalties if discovered.

The whole fabric of Freemasonry is built on the assumption that it is for men, and for men only. The admission of women has never been for one moment seriously contemplated by Grand Lodge, the members of which view with horror the mere possibility of such a departure from ancient custom and tradition.

The head of every lodge is known as the Worshipful Master. Do the women Masons address their chief officer as Grand Mistress? It is difficult to know how much of the wording used in the various ceremonies could be altered to make it suitable for women.

There is only one recorded case of a woman having been regularly admitted into Freemasonry. It took place many years ago in Ireland, when Masonic meetings were held sometimes in a rather free and easy manner in private houses instead of duly consecrated temples.

The woman in question was Mrs.

Norton, connected with the St. Leger family, and the present Viscount Doneraile vouches for the truth of the story.

Mrs. Norton hid herself in the room during a lodge meeting and was only discovered too late to prevent her from hearing and learning much.

To escape from the difficulty thus created it was then and there decidto make her a proper Freemason, and she was accordingly duly initiated into the craft.

Freemasonry in this country has been admirably organized. Grand Lodge keeps an iron hand upon it.

Nothing in the nature of religious or political discussion is allowed.

English Freemasonry is quite free from the taint that attaches to it in some other countries of being used for secret intrigue and propaganda of religious or political principles.

Apart from the undesirability of women becoming Masons, it is recognized that there would be danger attending their admission. How many women can keep a secret?—Ex.

Notes and Comments.

Boston College went "over the top" for its drive for $2,000,000.

One of the principal discussions at the National Academy of Sciences, during its recent annual session at Washington, was "The Problem of Steering an Automobile Around a Corner."

"Perhaps," says an exchange, "if we let the next generation pay the cost of the war we have had, the next generation will be less inclined to start a new one."

The latest production in motor buses, with body construction similar to that of a trolley car, has electric lights and push buttons, leather upholstery and a safety door. It seats twenty-seven persons.

"This day light-saving things doesn't make any bit with me at all," grumbled the clerk.

"Why not?"

"Well, the boss used to beat it out in the middle of the afternoon to play golf and then the rest of us could take it easy, but now he sticks around the office until 5 o'clock and has plenty of time for golf afterwards."

The seaweed gown now in Paris, trimmed with the lustrous material saved on black taffeta, and with seaweed panniers at the hips and ribbons tutting in the breeze, is said to give a delightfully cooling effect even on the warmest days. Seaweed trimming would seem to be specially adapted for bathing suits.

The president of the Baldwin Locomotive Works says he prefers to ask applicants for employment the following three questions:

"How many cents are there in a dollar?"

"How many feet are there in a mile?"

"How many square feet are there in an acre?"

He adds that he wants men with a sense of finance, distance, and surface measurements.
