After a man has become a chronic cynic, it is impossible for mankind to fool him with any pretended virtues. The cynic is so wise that he sees through virtue as if it was a screen door. To the cynic piety is a parade, honesty is a bargaining for a higher price, decency is hypocrisy, and philanthropy is high class advertising. George Washington, according to the cynic, told the truth because the circumstantial evidence was overwhelming. Curtis thought he had never before heard the English language twisted into such enigmas as there few simple words presented. It was an outrage to credit this well-mannered and delightful girl with the cold-blooded callousness which seemed to reveal itself in every syllable. That she was blithely unaware of this element in her excited utterances was shown by her eager face and animated attitude. She had risen from the chair attitude. She had risen from the chair in which she had seated herself when they entered the room, and obviously expected him to lose no time in conducting her to the bedside of Jean de Courtois. "Pray sit down again, Miss Grandin," said Curtis, and his voice assumed a sterner, more commanding note, though he, too, stood up, and approached nearer, lest she might collapse in a faint and lest she might collapse in a faint and fall before he could save her. "I fear I have blundered woefully in assuming a role for which I am ill-fitted, but I must make you realize that your marriage is irrevocably—postponed." A slight color tinged her cheeks; she was actually becoming annoyed with

'Oh, poor fellow! I have lost my only friend, and now, indeed, I am the most wretched girl in all the world!" Flinging her clasped arms on the table, she hid her face in them, and sobbed as though her heart would break. Curtis placed a hand on her shoulder, and strove to calm her with such common-place phrases as his dazed brain could dictate, but she wept bitterly, just as a child might weep if disappointed about the non-fulfillment of some object on which its heart was set.

Curtis, who had never been so mystified in his life, followed up those last disjointed words as a man lost in a forest might cling to a path in the certainty that it would lead somewhere. He rejected all else, since the wild vagaries of events during the past few minutes were beyond his comprehension. He waited therefore until the vehemence waited, therefore, until the vehemence of her grief had somewhat subsided, and then, with another friendly pressure on

Her pleading, her attitude, her pathetic gestures, gave extraordinary force to an appeal which, by contrast with her extreme agitation, was almost grotesquely inconsequent. Curtis was at his wits' end to find the line of reasoning calculated to convince this beautiful creature that she might, indeed, begin enduring "for the sake of others" by expressing her determination to give the police all possible

Oh, if you are a man you will want to help me, rather than push me into the living tomb which threatens to engulf me before tomorrow morning."

Even in their agitation they both heard the jar of a bell. The girl sprang upright. There was something splendid in her courage, in the way she threw back her

"Ah, me!" she sighed. "Perhaps it is already too late!" To Be Continued.
