Guards,—ladies, officers and men,—came forward nobly and contributed greatly to the success of the affair, which ought to put a good sun in the fund, and be held as greatly to the credit of Prince George, who was mainly instrumental in getting it up. Some of the singing was very good indeed—almost professional.

News from Bermuda would be incomplete without a word as to how the Grenadiers are suffering their banishment. All are agreed in saying that a pleasanter lot of fellows than the officers were never met, and that it is wonderful how they have settled down to the dull routine of life here, after having been accustomed to all the delights of London. They fish, they sail boats, they garden, they keep chickens and cows, they play cricket,—in fact do all that in them lies to wile away the tedious time,—but the hours must notwithstanding, hang heavily on their hands, for they have but little work, all their men being employed on engineering works. As one of them said, the best of the place was that one could wear out one's old clothes so well. The men have little to complain of, they have plenty to do, and get extra pay for it. with no guards as in London, where they have about one night out in four, and but few parades. In fact many of them will be sorry to leave Bermuda.
