but to learn—what to him was the hardest lesson—what women thought was becoming. Upton had ideas of his own about beauty in women's apparel, and often when he made a design that he thought was his masterpiece it was only to have the manager of the millinery establishment push the design aside, declaring that if he put out hats like that his business would be ruined. So Upton would carry back the rejected drawings and crush them into his waste basket and start fresh the next morning with an effort to suppress his own notions about hats.

Upton always worked in secrecy. You see he was not proud of his calling. If the substantial, slow-moving chambermaid happened still to be setting his room to rights when he returned from breakfast, he was loath to get out his drawing things, but lingered over his morning paper or walked idly about his room. One day after she had left the room and he had begun in earnest, there was a knock at his door and, without waiting for Upton to call out "come," the chambermaid stuck her head in the door. She held a waste basket in her hand. "You don't make a mistake, sir, do you, and throw away pictures you want?" she held a waste basket in her hand. "You don't make a mistake, sir, do you, and throw away pictures you want?" she asked. "Some of these here pretty girl's heads, I mean, seems 'most too good to throw away."

"Oh, those," Upton said as the woman held up a crushed and crumpled girl's head wearing, what the day before he had judged one of his best designs only to have it condemned as impossible by the practical millinery manager, "those are rubbish. I just do them—to amuse myself, as it were." And the chambermaid withdrew, draging her mop and carpet sweeper after her.

them—to amuse myself, as it were."
And the chambermaid withdrew, dragging her mop and carpet sweeper after her.

The hat in question was inspired by a muscle shell. Upton had seen hats that were inspired by roses and sweet peas and even by canary birds. That sort of thing was trite. He happened to have a few shells that he had gathered on the seashore the summer before and treasured for no very good reason, and it occurred to him one day that in the graceful curves of the muscle shell and in its deep, penetrating black with brown, green and blue shadings, he might devise a hat that would be worth designing. The head he drew for this head was the head of a seanympth. He always made the faces instituted in the hats—if the hat showed Japanese influence the girl was shightly slant-eyed, if she wore a sombrero she was of Spanish features. The hat was of black slik above with shadings of brown and blue and the lining beneath the brim was of the shimmering grey of the inside of a muscle shell. Upton really reveled in this hat—only to have it rejected the next day at headquarters, while an insipid little hat of dark blue straw with a cherry dangling at one side was pronounced a "winner."

Upton had not learned his lesson. In another daring mood he designed a hat that he said was inspired by a German air raid at night, though the millinery manager did not even attempt to see the similarity. He did admit, however, that the design was original and might do for a theatrical costume, but for his purposes—never. And that was consigned to the waste basket, where a few days before had gone the muscle shell hat and on another day a hat that had been suggested by the colors and shape of spring onlon. Upton had had them for dinner the night before and had actually carried one to his room, put it in water and taken his design from life. That also was among the failures.

Upton knew that onlon hat of his was original. Still someone else must have designed with the colors as given in his sketch reproduced exactly. An expert milliner own role as hat designer. Then—and this was really too much for Upton's peace of mind—the little could not guess how the hat had been made. There was nothing at all strik-ing in the cut or coloring of the hat—

Finally after she had been wearing the three hats for three weeks, he could stand the suspense no longer and he bravely followed her out of the dining-room one night, and with the menner of an old friend bade her a good evening. Not being repulsed, he sat talking with her in the hotel recention-room. ception-room.

Upton was a very direct sort of person and even before he sought to solve the mystery, he told her that he was more interested in her than he had ever been in any girl before, and she,
