At the Grand.

The Virginian. Lovers of romance who have read and been enthralled by Owen Wister' powerful novel "The Virginian," have ntunity this week of seeing an opportunity this week of seeing a beautiful dramatic production of the book at the Grand Opera House. As s well known to the majority of thea tregoers, "The Virginian" is in four acts—the first at Uncle Henry's house, the second at Judge Henry's nouse, the second at Judge Henry's ranch, the third at the camp of the horse thieves, and the fourth at Medicine Bow, Wyoming. In the matter of atmosphere, which was encored. A quartet and as a neproduction of life on the understanding and Max Gundelfinger, the musical distruction and the contractor a fenced range in the early 80's, the play is true to life in every particular. The play is a carefully studied depiction of types and scenes in the far west when types and scenes in the far west when most of the states were then territories. The characters are skilfully drawn, and there is none of the highly colored material usually associated with stage portrayals of life on the plains. and Max Gundelfinger, the musical director, enters to try over his singers. "The Keynote of Love is Dough," he announces. His song, "Something Always Happens When it Shouldn't," with a very funny 'cello effect, had to be repeated. One of his singers has a cold, and 'Mile. Athenee (Miss Scheff), whose motor car has broken down outside, generously offers to take the place of a girl with a cold whose mother is ill. Lieut. Armand, in love with Athenee, turns up. She repulses him for he is expected to marry the Counthere in the period mentioned.

The story relates principally to the love of the Virginian for Molly Wood, the pretty Vermont school teacher, and to the hatred of Trampas, the villain-ous cattle thief, for the Virginian. The first act opens with a dance and christ-ening. He quarrels with Trampas and the act ends with the exceedingly funny scene where the Virginian and Honey Wiggins mix the babes left sleeping in an adjoining room.
