CHAPTER VII.

MR. FANGLE TELLS THE LATEST NEWS.

Mr. Chappell took advantage of the conversation between his wife and Mr. Armstrong to draw Richard away. Lord Beaumortis chatted with Mr. Wakefield upon the deplorable spread of democracy, and Mr. Wakefield, who was in the conservative interest, agreed with his lordship. He propounded a theory that the spread of democracy was due to the discovery of the goldfields. It has made money more plentiful, and the working-man, reveling in high wages, set himself up against his employer.

'It is a bad state of things,' said Mr. Wakefield, 'when Jack considered himself as good as his master.'

Mr. Saint Fitzfiddle, being left to himself, took refuge before a mirror, wherein he contemplated without weariness the parting of his hair.

This is scarcely a time to speak of business,' said Mr. Chappell to Richard, 'but I may as well remind you that the share list in the United Wheat closes at noon to-morrow—what do you advise?' asked Richard.

'My dear Mr. Barton,' said Mr.
Chappell, with a frank smile, 'I must not directly advise in a matter in which, as you are aware, I am so intimately interested. I could not conscientiously do so. Where my own interest is not at stake, I am always ready to counsel a friend.
But you can see for yourself; the shares this afternoon are quoted at one premium. I have investigated the affairs of the company, and the prospects are really wonderful—The assays give from twelve to eighteen per cent. That is all I can say, and I would not say as I shall invest largely in it. Now, you have a considerable sum of money lying idle, and the United Wheat guarantees six per cent. for ten years.'

'Upon your recommendation,' said Richard, 'but Mr. Chappell interrupted him.

'No, no; not in this instance. I am Chairman of Directors, and am in a delicate position. I can only say that I had a hundred thousand pounds lying idle. I would with perfect confidence invest it in the United Wheat. From present appearances, the shares will be at a high premium in a month, and if otherwise, the investment is a good one.'

'I should not put my money into it as an investment; I should sell out in a week or two.'

'You have a famous head for business; but I should hold on—Hester, I'll not advise.'

'The shares are at a hundred pounds.'

'Yes; you might take a hundred or a hundred and fifty with safety.
I will use my interest, and if you will apply for shares be allotted.'

'Thank you; I will take a hundred.'

'That's right. Come into another room, and I will fill in the application-paper. I am glad that you set on your own judgment in this matter.'

They went into one of the small retiring-rooms, and Mr. Chappell wrote the application.

'Sign your name here. That's right. You can let me have the check in the morning. I see you are anxious to join the ladies. I will excuse you.'

When Richard entered the room Mr. Chappell, he caught sight of Mrs. Fangle, and observing in her manner a desire to speak to him, he now went in search of her. A few steps from the door he came upon Mrs. Fangle.

'Do you know where Mrs. Fangle is?'

'Do you know where Mr. Chappell is?'

These questions crossed one another. Mr. Fangle answered in the negative. Richard pointed to the room in which he had left the banker, and passed on.

'What can be want with my wife?'

thought Mr. Fangle, looking after Richard.

He was so much in the habit of neglecting his wife, that for any one to want her was a matter of surprise to him. But in the light of a more important matter, Mrs.
Fangle faded from his mind. He had just had a few words with Mr.
Magnum, a member of the Stock Exchange, who, finding no other person to talk with, talked with Mr.
Fangle. Mr. Fangle was in his glory. Mr. Magnum had given him some information, which he was burning now to impart to Mr. Chappell, thinking it would be agreeable to him. Mr. Fangle was a worshipper of rich men, and liked to rub against rich men's coats. It was not as good as being rich himself, but it was almost next door to it.
'Bankers and merchants,' he said to himself, after his interview with Mr.

Magnum, 'are always eager to hear the latest news—especially about
