MAKING THINGS PLEASANT.

The rascal was young, and every young man, however bad, must have tender feelings toward a pretty girl whose heart he has just won—although he has won it under false pretences. So there was a tenderness mingled with his self-congratulations as he retired to rest that night and thought over the events of the day.
"Hang it," he said, "she's a dear little girl. I don't see why we shouldn't be happy for evermore with one another—I am awfully fond of her. I guess when it's all over I shall have rooted myself rather firmly in this establishment."
But he took the precaution of putting more articles of furniture than usual behind his door. It was well to guard against the chance of Mr. Bouchier having learned the event of the day and going Berserk, utterly regardless of consequences. But nothing of consequence transpired for the next few days. Then the townward migration took place. The visitor left a day before the family, promising to pay his respects very soon in London. Mr. Bouchier with hearty good-will speeded the parting guest.

How do they do it, these handsome camps? How do they persuade a girl against her better nature to take a step she knows to be wrong? To meet clandestinely, to correspond through hidden channels, and at last to consent to a secret marriage? We do not know how—we are respectable people, fathers of families, it may be, who have been married to our partners in the orthodox way, with bridesmaids, grooms, favors and cakes. We know nothing of the manner in which such a thing is brought about; we only know that occasionally it does happen. That a girl, at the bidding of some scamp, will leave her home, her father and mother, her friends who have loved her since childhood, and trust her future, without a saving clause, to the mercy of the man she loves. It is strange, but it is so.

Perhaps there was some excuse for Josephine. She was romantic; she was going to marry a hero; she was willing to sacrifice to the welfare of her family. The moment the ring was on her finger concealment was to be at an end—and more than all Digby wished it. She may have sighed in secret for the orange-blossoms, acousous, and other bridal accessories, but Digby was resolved on a private marriage. As soon as the rite was performed, the news may be proclaimed. Indeed, they would go down to her father's house, Redhills, and spend the honeymoon. They would have nothing to be ashamed of.

So, with these arguments she stilled her conscience; and one fine day, toward the end of May, Mrs. Bouchier came into her husband's presence with trepidation in her look and an open letter in her hand.
"I am very busy, Adelaide," said Mr. Bouchier, testily.
She handed him the letter without a word. It was from Josephine. A half-penitent, half-triumphant letter. She had married Digby that morning. They had gone down to Redhills to stay for awhile. She was sorry for the concealment, but Digby had told her every thing; and when her papa and mamma knew how nobly and generously he was proceeding to be brave in the matter, she felt sure they would freely forgive both her husband and herself.

Philip Bouchier read it from beginning to end; his wife waiting anxiously to hear what he would say, but not without an idea that matters had shaped themselves to the best end. Then her husband laid down the letter, gazed at her with a look on his face which froze her blood, uttered some five words—a curse which made the woman shiver like an aspen—threw out his arms, and fell senseless across his study-table, with a thin stream of blood trickling from his nostrils.
"Truly, his punishment had begun!"

CHAPTER IX.
MDLL. FRANCESA.
It is still spring; but the spring of the third year after that which witnessed the events last recorded. We are still surrounded by green, but not the green of the meadows. It is a tossing, tumbling, changing green; darting about in those short chopping hillocks of water; which make the English Channel such a terror to travellers. The Newhaven boat has just steamed out of Dieppe harbor, and the passengers are preparing to enjoy it, or to endure it as best they can, according to the disposition of each, or the power possessed of withstanding old Neptune's rough gambols—for the wind is blowing merrily, and, although there is not a great sea on, there is enough to make the experienced steward and stewardess feel sure that there will be many calls for those painfully suggestive white objects which it is their duty to distribute as needed.
The boat's a great sea on, there is not a very large steamer to enter; and if harbors are made for boats, boats in return must be made for harbors. Nevertheless, in spite of the long voyage, it is astonishing

The Use Of
Harm, drastic purgatives to relieve constipation is a dangerous practice, and more liable to fasten the disease on the patient than to cure it. What is needed is a medicine that, in effectually opening the bowels, corrects the constive habit and establishes a natural daily action. Such an aperient is found in which, while thorough in action, strengthen as well as stimulate the bowels and excretory organs.
Ayer's Pills,

"For eight years I was afflicted with constipation, and I had become so bad that I could do no more for me. Then I got Ayer's Pills, and soon the bowels were regular and natural in their action. I am now in excellent health."
—Delaware, Dorset, Ont.
I feel the need of a cathartic, I get Ayer's Pills, and find them to be more than any other pill I ever took."—Mrs. B. C. Grubb, Burlington, Vt.

"For years I have been subject to constipation and nervous headaches, caused by derangement of the liver. After taking various remedies, I have become convinced that Ayer's Pills are the best. They have never failed to relieve my bilious attacks in a short time; and I am sure my system remains in tone longer after the use of these pills, than has been the case with any other medicine I have tried."—H. S. Sledge, Wilmot, Vt.
