CHAPTER XII.

Such were the conversations which Willie often had with his young companions. The same personal application of the doctrine of eternal pun ishment was in the mouths of all of them. In their discussions with Willie they sought chiefly to show that it was impossible for him to believe in such a doctrine. His association with them, his conduct toward them, the pleasure which he enjoyed with them, all these, they said, showed that he could not look upon them as lost souls. If he did, why did he not say so-why did he not warn them of their danger, and tell

Thus Willie's decline in religious feeling, had placed him in a fearful dilemma. To escape he had to do one of two things. He must at on change his whole life and conversation, and devote himself to the conversion of his friends; or he must go over to their belief. The former he shrank from doing. How could he now talk re-ligion to those gay friends? If he tried it what aughter, and banter, and sarcasm, he would draw upon himself. But in such a case he would inevitably cut himself off from their society, for how could they endure the company of one who only went among them to prophesy wee? On the other hand, what was he to do? Could he take that last step? Could he go over to them? In one word-could be give no the Bible?

Such was the struggle that was going on with in him. - In his present state he had lost hold of that Rock which is the only foundation for Christian faith. He was tossing and drifting upon a wide sea, at the mercy of the pitiless waves. How could he seek for comfort in his Bible, when already through the arguments of his friends, his faith in that book had been shaken; when he had learned to look upon it as full of inconsistencies, and extravagances which could only be rejected by an elevated mind? How could be go for refuge to God, when he had learned to look upon Him as one who was too great to notice man but from his exalted station, as Ruler of the Universe, regarded all manenly source of strength was unsought by him, was it strange that he should fall away rapidly one by one loosen the many bonds that ad him to the faith of his childhood?

friends, which spread over every doctrine of the Bible, centred around the great teaching of the blessedness of the righteous, and the eternal misery of the lost. Yet this Willie felt to be blended with the whole life and spirit of the Bible. It lived in every page, and more strongly than all in the teachings of the Saviour. That the world was lost through sin, he knew. but it was the eternity of the ruin that followed this loss, which trouble his soul.

Other thoughts were now associated with these which affected all his future life.

He had been sent here for a special purpo by his generous friend. That friend loved him for the religion which he thought he saw in him. He had been sent here to obtain an education not for his own personal benefit, but in order that he might afterward devote himself to the ministry. For this was Mr. King's idea, he ought, to do good to the cause of religion, by fitting one for the ministry, whom he supposed to be every way qualified to be useful in that

But he had now reached that state of mind in nich he found it impossible for him to preach the gospel. The truths of that gospel had be come distasteful to his soul; he refused to re-situation without any difficulty, and that the man's notice. The captain of the steamer generous assistance which he had hitherto re- running around cursing and swearing. ceived, would fully enable him to support him-

Finally, he wrote a long letter to Mr. King, thanking him for his benevolence. He detailed the experience which he had received, and the changes which had taken place in his religious sentiments; informed him of the resolution which struck him. he had been compelled to take. With this, he bade him farewell.

After spending about three weeks with Aunt Helen, he bade her good-bye, and departed to seek his fortune in the Great West.

CHAPTER XIII.

The only idea which Willie had on his departure, was the vague one of getting a situation out West. His Aunt wished him to remain in New York, but he was unwilling to do this. Thar's the office." He had not fixed upon any plan of action, but simply looked out for something to turn up. He thought so incessantly about the nature of the step itself which he had taken, that he gave but little attention to his own personal prospects. Was he right thus to cut himself off from a bright future ; thus to sever his connection with college; and throw away the disinterested friendship of Mr. King ? Had he then gone forth irrevocably from the teachings of his childhood; had he so completely given up the Bible, that revocably from the teachings of his childhood; had he so completely given up the Bible, that this course was necessary? Would it not have been better for him to want? Perhaps if he had his new views might have been modified or totally changed. Had he not been altogether too hasty? But then the thought of his companions recurred to his mind. How could he resume his place among them. Silby had graduated, and left, but others were there. Could he go back among them as a believing Christian, and fulfil a Christian's duties, by warning them of their danger?

Such were the thoughts that distracted him

Such were the thoughts that distracted him on his journey to the West. He had taken a through-ticket to Cincinnatti, end so he rolled along, hour after hour, over the lorg way for slope of the control through-ticker to Chiching the hore way for many hundreds of miles. All was new. He passed beyond the Hudson Valley, and through the bustling towns of Troy, Schenectady, and on to the tumult and surging life of Buffalo. Then on along the Southern borders of Lake Erie, over whose waters he could look, as he rode along, and watch the countless sails that glistened from afar, like white clouds over all the bright blue streets of Cleveland, where turning southwardly the road bore him through many a laughing valley, and over many a fertile plain, past busy villages and hamlets, and through vigorous youngcities that sprung up on every hand, with the strength and lusty life of giants. At length the thousand weary miles were traversed, and Willie stepped forth with his valise into the streets of Cir nnatti.

His first emotions were those of astonishment. All the controversy between Willie and his Prepared as he was to find a large and flourishing city, he was surprised at its real magnitude. In length and breadth ; in costly and magnificent architecture; in its rushing torrent of life; in its endless train of horses, carriages, and busy men endless train of horses, carriages, and busy men of all classes and conditions, who ever hurried past; it rivalled New York itself. Far and wide o'er the plain Checinnath, show out its streets, till they stopped at the barrier of lofty hills that encircled it, and then, repelled from these, it overleaped the river on the opposite side, to form new cities on the Southern shore.

If then he could not enter into the ministry, it was evident that Mr. King's design must fall with respect to him; what he had already spent would be wasted. It would not be just to require him to expend any more on him. This conclusion was inevitable. He could not repeated in the could not was inevitable. He could not repeated in the could do.
