The Daily Fashion Hint

"But how can that be " says Vivien warmly, pausing and boldly confronting Mrs. Maitland on the field track." "Do you mean to say it can be known how I am going out of this field—through that gate or the other one—and yet I am free to choose which gate I like. Oh, that must be non-sense."

"Do not talk in that way, Vivien. "Do not talk in that way, Vivien. It is most improper—implous. Respect for me should at least—"
It was very rarely that Mrs. Maitland stopped an argument in this manner, and then only because the subject had been sufficiently ventilated or had become dangerous—never,

VI winced at the ugly notion of stingeling carried even into the wardrobe.

"What about moth?"

"Ah!"—and Mrs. Maitland winced in her turn. "I'll tell you what, Vi. You shall help me go through mythings. One can't be too careful."

Then, without perceptible transition from the clothes, they would find themselves weigning the problem of tree will and predestination.

"But how can that be " says Vivien warmly, pausing and boldly confronting Mrs. Maitland on the field track."

"I am much obliged to you. And what else would you do, pray?"

"I would give Marian a hundred or a thousand a year so that she need never be afraid of having to earn her own living. She is, you know." Simble would be settled on other friends, and papa's life would be

"And might I inquire what you would do for yourself, my dear?"

Vivien looks puzzled.

"I have been saying what I would do. All that I have said." Then, taking Mrs. Maitland's hand, "what would you do?"

"Retire," said Mrs. Maitland, promptly. "But what a little Alnaschar you are. A fable in the Arabian Nights. Yes you may read it. A satire. Well, a tale mocking at folk who indulge in idle dreams—"

"Why retire?" asks Vi, linking fingers caressingly. "Are you tired of

After such a walk, and after the high tea, mistress and pupil would pass the long evening in the pleasant study with the latticed bookshelves. Vivien always had a new novel—by the late Mr. Dickens, the late Mr. Thackeray, or the late Str W. Scott. Baronet—and Mrs. Maitland had her book—the ledger in which she traced with absorbing interest the recorded progress from quarter to quarter of Mary Baies, Kate Jones, or Adelaide Patterson.
