Saints who Were Lovers of Nature

There is no creature that does not declare to the saints the praises of God. As St. Augustine says, after St. Anthony, everything in the world speaks to them in a silent language of their God, St. Gregory Nazianzen, walkng on the seashore, observed how he waves advancing upon the, beach, left behind them shells ittle periwinkles stalks of weeds. small oysters and the like, which the sea had cast upon the shore ind then returning with other waves, took part of them back. while the adjoining rocks continned firm and immovable, though he billows beat them with so nuch violence. Upon this he nade this salutary reflection; that eeble souls like shells and stalks of weeds, suffer themselves to be orne away sometimes by afflicion and other times by consolaion, at the mercy of the incontant billows of fortune; but the ourageous souls continue firm and unmoved under all kinds of storms. From this thought he proceeded to these aspirations of David (Ps. IX. 8): "Save me O God, for the waters are come n even unto my soul, O waters. I am come into the lepths of the sea and a tempest ath ouerwhelmed me.'
