Henry VIII. and Tennis.

Workmen re-roofing Westminister Hall, London, recently found two ound objects in the dust and cobvebs in the old oak rafters 90 feet above the ground. When the dust and grime had been removed these objects roved to be ancient tennis balls. An tiquarian says that, judging from heir size and structure, the balls date back to the reign of Henry VIII. ### Ireland's Black Night.

bust my phonograph."

In Ireland the night is still black and of the dawn there is scarcely a glimmer. The season of goodwill went by without a truce, and the New Year like the old, is being stained with murder and reprisals. The only change seems to be that the military are becoming more and more masters of the situation, and that the burning of houses has in some cases been officially authorised. De Valera, President of the so-called Irish Republic, is back in Feland, but it is reported that he will not negotiate peace except on the basis of Ireland's independence. If that be so, the "war" must go on until the rebellion is exhausted; but will not moderate Irish opinion take charge and say that the waste of life and wealth for an impossible ideal must cease? Irish freedom within the free British Confederation is assured, and anything else is not worth fighting for.—Liverpool Weekly Post.
