surprise, and she stood still, staring at him and wondering.

It was Mr. Glover—Glover the millionaire, as some people called him, but he was scarcely worth $1,000,000, although he was, past all doubt, the great man and the rich man of the place. Among other things he was a power in the school where Louisa taught, and in that way she had seen him occasionally, and had even exchanged words with him now and then. But never in all her experience had Louisa seen Mr. Glover—or any one else—look as that gentleman now looked. His face wore the pallor of the dead; his eyes were wild and haggard; his dress disordered, and his movements uncertain and shaky, like a drunken man's. He would have passed her by, unconscious of her presence, without a leok; but Louisa stepped forward, laid her by, unconscious of her presence, without a leok; but Louisa stepped forward, laid her hand heavily on his arm and called him sharply by his name.

In long years after she often said that trunk where Louisa had been resting, and motioning to her to do so also he said:

"Sit down, Miss Clare, sit down."
Louisa obeyed instantly.

"Are you very unhappy, Miss Clare?"
asked Mr. Glover.

"Unhappy, sir—about what?"

"Oh! nothing in particular. I mean merely in a general way."

"I am not unhappy at all, sir."

"Is it possible? And yet, your salary=let me think. I believe it is something about $300 a year that they give you?"

"Just $300 a year, sir."

"And yet you are not unhappy!"

"Very seldom. I am very happy, on the contrary. Ah! sir—it is not alone the possession of money that makes people happy."

pressed cry of fright, but as Mr. Glover returned and reseated himself, she sat down beside him.

"Miss Clare," he said, carnestly and gratefully, "you have saved me from committing a great orime. I came out here to kill myself with that pistol that you have seen me throw away; and but for your intervention, the tears in your gentle eyes, and the hopeful ocurage in your voice, I would have done it. I will tell you now—what all the world will know to morrow—I am a ruined man. But I will not die like a coward i j will live and face the music, as they say. Good-bye, you wise little waman. You have saved an immortal soul this morning simply by being the brave, contented, hopeful being that you are. Good-bye! good-bye!"

He wrung her hand hard enough to bring the tears in her eyes, and turned away, while Louisa went home rather dizzy, her heart in a whirl, and altogether too much amazed by the scene just ended to think much about her own share in it.

When the state of Mr. Glover's money affairs become public, there was the usual nine days' wonder. He yielded everything to his creditors, and found that hey were more nearly satisfied than he had absolutely nothing; but he was still an able man. He had falled honorably, and people were willing to trust him. And after it was all over he went one day to see Louisa, and tool her that he found she was right; his state of mind was far from deperate. Indeed, he was almost heapy.

After that he want to see the little school-teacher quite often—indeed so often that he seriously interfered with her dustist; and when she came to know him quite well shee contrary. Ah! sir—it is not alone the possession of money that makes people happy."

And then, fearing that she had said something so personal it might be rule—for Mr. Glover was so rich and so evidently not happy—Louisa felt the color mount to her cheeks, and her eyes dropped before the intent gaze of her companion.

"Do you think a man might ever be happy, and yet quite poor!" asked Mr. Glover—"so poor that, compared with what he had been, his position would be one almost of peverty?

"On! yes," said Louisa, with a gentle confidence in her own words; "I am quite sure of that; for, what does the most extravagant wealth give more than one can enjoy simply by having enough? One can only eat or drink or sleep enough—at least one ought not to do so any more than enough," she added, with a smile; "and those who do are not happier for it."

Mr. Glover looked at her as though she had solved the great problem of existence.

"What a wise little woman?" he said, and then drawing a pistol from his pocket, he rose, took a few steps forward, and flung the water beyond.

Louisa had started up with a scarcely repressed cry of fright, but as Mr. Glover returned and reseated himself, she said down beside him.

"Miss Clare," he said, earnestly and gratefully, "you have saved me from com-
