

has been in many ways unfortunate for the human race. Surgeons and dentists have, until the discovery of Borine, regarded it as indispensable to have their instruments in a tray of carbolic solution which, if it was strong enough to sterilize the instruments, destroyed the surgeon's hands for practical purposes. A dentist, after completing an operation, accompanied his patient to his outer office to give some directions, leaving a small bottle of carbolic acid (open) on the bracket of his dental chair; during his brief absence his little boy about two years old, entered the surgery, climbed upon the chair, and with child-like curiosity proceeded to examine the bottle, and finally drank the contents. The result is evident. Now is not this proof irrefragable? Had Borine been the antiseptic used, and the same event taken place (because Borine can be used internally, and even in large doses is non-toxic), this unfortunate accident would not have occurred. The value of such an antiseptic, therefore, as Borine cannot be too highly estimated. As a wash for the mouth, teeth, nose and ears, or as a vaginal douche, it is regarded by specialists as the ideal one both in health and disease.
