"A highly pretentious and successful book of travel. The book is written in a style that is distinctly literary, and the publishers have given a fine setting to the scores of pictures and to the text."

— St. Louis Globe Democrat.

"Mr. Maurice Hewlett's 'Road in Tuscany' is one of those genial, leisurely, charming books, with a touch of intimate knowledge, that we find in the combination of the artist and traveler. It reveals the real Italy, with its color and fragrance, which is known only to those who get away from the towns and cities. Typographically the work is elegant, and the pictures really illustrate."

— Review of Reviews.

"In this work Mr. Hewlett has produced one of the most enticing of recent books of travel. It combines the picturesque charm of description and a wonderful command of English, with the rare insight of a man who loves Italy above all lands."

— Boston Herald.

"It is not too much to say—perhaps it is not enough—that every one who wishes to have an English library of books of or concerning Italy should have this utterly frank and charming comment upon Tuscany,—a book never grossly explanatory, never offensively instructive, but for those who, knowing the history, the poetry, and the achievement of Italian artists, are ready now to sit in contemplation of these things."
