

Acadia Seminary.

The Object.

The object of Acadia Seminary is to provide a broad and thorough education for young women, and to prepare them for the different stations in life which they may occupy. To this end, it fosters all that is praiseworthy, while it aims to secure a harmonious development of the mental faculties. It seeks to train and develop the mind, and to cultivate the heart; to mould character, and to implant lofty aims and ideals. Religious culture is recognized as the basis of true womanhood, and the refining and ennobling influences of a Christian home are constantly thrown around the students.

The instruction in all departments is given by experienced and thoroughly competent teachers. Modern and progressive methods of teaching are employed, and the pupils are patiently led into habits of study and right ways of thinking.

The systematic arrangements of school and family duties, the constant association with teachers and fellow students from widely separate parts of the country, the attractive and elevating surroundings, all tend to form symmetrical and disciplined characters, based upon wise and broad foundations.

The Situation.

The situation is one of the most favorable that could have been selected, combining healthfulness, with variety and loveliness of scenery.

From its elevated position on College Hill, the Seminary commands an extensive view of the Basin of Minas, the distant shores of the Bay of Fundy, the Promontory of Blomidon, the broad dyke meadows of the Cornwallis Valley, and the legendary scenes of Grand Pre, the home of the early Acadians.
