The One Thing Queerer

By RUTH CAMERON

THE Lady-Who-Always-Knows-Somehow and Molly were having a conference on the one subject that is always interesting to women. Molly had een shopping for a chiffon waist. She had looked in four shops without findanything to satisfy her, and the Lady was advising her to try W's.

The Wants-to-be-Cynic had been poking the fire and listening. Finally e broke out in comment. "If that isn't just like a woman. Been to four shops and going to some more. Catch a man doing anything like that!"

"No," retorted Molly, "of course you wouldn't. What a man does is to go into a shop and buy the first suit the salesman shows him, no matter what it looks like. Sometimes it happens to look decently on him and sometimes it doesn't. Take that gray suit you hated so that you scarcely wore it; if you had ever looked around would you have bought that? Didn't you tell me it was the first thing the salesman showed you? Catch a woman being that

> "Funny how different men and women are," rumi nated the Cynic, swinging gracefully into a general discussion. "There's lots of little things like that which don't seem to have any particular connection with sex that they're as different about as can be."

"Yes," agreed the Lady-Who-Always-Knows Somehow, "queer little things, too. For instance, did you ever notice that all women want to have the winow shades kept even with the middle sash and all men want to run them

"Women never will take a chance the way men will," contributed the Man-Who-Thinks. "For instance, nine women out of ten would rather have their husbands earn a steady income, even if it were small, than take a chance for bigger things. The normal man is just the other way around."

"Well, did you ever notice the way men always draw diagrams when they try to explain anything?" said Molly. "That's something you never see a woman do. Ask any man how to get anywhere and he whips out his pencil and an enevelope and has a diagram drawn in twenty seconds. Ask ten women the same question and you wouldn't get a single diagram."

"One difference I notice particularly," said the Man-Who-Thinks, "is how much more patience women have than men and how much less ingenuity. Woman endures, man cures. Men never would have stood the incom veniences of housework as women have. Give a man and a woman a daily task to do, hampered by some inconvenience, and the man won't do it more once before he will be studying how to get rid of the inconvenience while the woman will probably go on enduring until doomsday." Women are certainly queer things," said the Wants-to-be-Cynic. "Only one thing queerer," said Molly.
