ANOTHER VERSION RINGWOR

Of the Heroic Deed of Abigail Becker on Long Point.

She Was Never Adequately Rewarded -The Government Did Nothing For Her.

Wm. Bunning, proprietor of the market fish stall, was raised around Long Point fish stall, was raised around Long Point and knows every foot of the ground and the water. He is connected by marriage with the heroine of Long Point, his wife's sister being married to a nephew of Mrs. Becker. Mr. Bunning knew Mrs. Becker before she married. Her maiden name was Jackson and on the death of her husband, Becker, she married Henry Rorher, a companion of the Marie City fish wan't.

the Maple City fish man's.
"It is surprising," said Mr. Bunning,
"how many different stories will circulate about the same occurrence. Having spert over half my life on the shores of Lake Erie in the vicinity of Long Point, there are few of the happenings there of the years from 1855 to 1870 and later that I am not familiar with. So you may guess I ead with interest the two accounts in your paper in regard to Abigail Becker and I must say, in all fairness, that neither of them were correct. The one written by Mrs. Richardson was the nearest right but it was out on some points. I was living just across the bay from where the wreck was and I, then a boy of 16, was one of those who wen over partly by sleigh and partly by boat to help bring the ship wrecked men to land. It was about five miles across the water and a nasty trip it w.s, I can tell you. Mrs. Becker or as I best know her and the name she now has, Mrs. Rorher, was a tall, powerful woman. She was only 30 when she married. Becker who at that time was an old man. Mrs. Becker at the time of the shipwreck was alone on the island with her children. They were in poor circumstances and although it was November the children were running about barefooted. he vessel was a good half mile from shore. Why, off that coast the sand bar extends away out in the water and it is impossible away out in the shore than as far as from the market to the C. P. R. station. Captian Hackett was the first man ashore.

assist Mrs. Becker but was overcome and she had a double load to bring ashore. "Mrs. Becker never got any money from the government. The captain, the crew and Mr. McLeod, M. P., did all they could for her, but their means were limited. The captain sent first a box of shoes and warm clothing. afterwards purchased a pine wood farm on the mainland, and built a house on it. The land, however was poor and didn't yield much. To add to the trials of the household, Becker was not much of a farmer, but / pre-ferred trapping, and on one of his periodical trips to the island was frozen to death in the vicinity of his old home, his body being found on the island. Some years afterwards Mrs. Becker's son Eddie, was drowned. He was working for a man near Port Rowan, and he went out in the early morning of a November day to shoot duck. A snow storm came on, and the day was a nasty one. Eidie Becker didn't return at his accustomed time. Search parties were organized, and I was in ohe of them, but we could find trace of boat of man. The poor mother was frantic at this second calamity. She kept crying, "What have! I done to merit this? I saved a whole boat's crew, but I am power-

Rabbi Gotthell on Women of the Bible-Paithful Love of a Girl.

HE story of Ruth is one of those exquisite idylis of love and domestic life which brings remote afes close to our hearts while all the splendid incidents of solom history leave antiquity at a distance measured by the centuries that have rolled between, writes Rabbi Gottheil in Harper's Bazar. It has a distinction among these stories. It is the classic instance of a friendship between two women. What David and Jonathan, Damon and Pythias, are for men, that for the other sex are Ruth and Naomi. Andstrange contradiction to modern flippancy-it is the passionate love of a girl for her mother-in-law. Whoever, then, would be interested in Ruth must learn to take an interest in the elder friend Naomi. Nor is this difficult. Through the dimness of centuries we can still discern one of those personalities which sway towards themselves all who approach. At a time when personal names meant something she bore the name "Winsome." A generation ahead of the beautiful Ruth, Naomi had her reign of beauty; when in the story she comes to her native city a broken-hearted widow, there is a stir of excitement, as at the return of one who had been a charmer of all hearts. Sadness, quietness, strength, these make the notes of her life melody; but she has had the rare gift of making quiet strength attractive.

The story passes into a phase of life widely sundered from modern customs and sentiment; a phase of life touched in the narrative with the utmost deli-cacy. A deep principle pervading the constitution of Israel was care for the preservation of families. Hence the curious "levirate law:" where a hus-band had died without issue, the nearest brother-in-law (levir) might be called upon by the widow to perform for her all the duties of a husband; and raise up seed for the deceased. Here, however; there is no brother-in-law available; both the sons of Elimelech were dead. But round the strict letter of the law had grown up the more elastic "custom of goel:" the nearest of kin had a general duty to act as "redeemer" (goel) for the unfortunate, avenging their death or relieving their distress. If there was no law to help Ruth, might not something be made out of the custom of kinship? Naomi ponders while Ruth is gleaning through the days of barley harvest, and by the end of the season she has her bold plan. No false delicacy is al-lowed by Ruth to interfere; it is not for the Moabite stranger to question the customs of Israel; moreover, innocence is most triumphant when it can maintain its purity in equivocal cir-When the time comes cumstances.

Ruth is ready to play her part. The joyous festivities of harvest home have run their course, and at the end each reveller, wherever he finds himself, lies down to sleep in the gen ial night air. Ruth, closely veiled, steals through the darkness to the place where Boaz is reposing, his head on a heap of barley. She softly lays herself at his feet. Boaz awakens, startled; the sweet voice which had thrilled him with its foreign accents all through the day's gleaning is heard: "I am Ruth, thine handmaid; spread therefore thy skirt over thine handmaid; for thou art a near kinsman." It is the last word which is to co vey Naomi's hint to Boaz; his heart catches it in a moment. But his first thought is for the innocent young woman before him. He speaks tender words; then addresses himself to the task of getting Ruth away before the least breath of scandal can touch her. As she is leaving, another kind thought occurs to him; he has marked the pious frauds of the affectionate girl at the harvesting meets, and now shakes into her lap six measures of barley that she may not go empty to her mother-in-law. Ruth arrives at the cottage while there is still not light enough for recognition; when she tells her tale Naomi knows that her scheme is successful: "The man will not rest, until he have finished the thing this Paderewski on Piano Playing. In my opinion, every child should be taught the piano. I know that it is considered an open question nowadays as to whether it is worth while for a child to study music, unless it shows special aptitude in that direction. It is not now unusual to find young women in society ignorant of the piano; but, to my mind, general culture demands that every civilized person should be acquainted with all the manifestations of culture. The only way to comprehend art is to have some knowledge of art. As the piano is the best instrument to show all species of music, every child should As to the length of time to be devoted to practice, for those who treat music as an additional subject of general education, one hour and a half or two hours daily are usually sufficient. For children I should recommend several periods of practice a day, each of about a half hour duration. Young students should never be allowed to practise over an hour at one time, as the fatigue attending prolonged exer-cise of this kind is apt to counterbalance any good attained. The two hours' daily practice can easily be divided into two, three, or even four per-

Advanced students should devote at least three hours a day to practice. The time at which a child may take its first "piece," as it is commonly called, depends entirely upon the pu-pil's aptitude and zeal. The teacher must be the best judge of that.
