Irish Particularly Prone to "Break Down" Mentally.

Down" Mentally.

A special report of the inspector of lunatics in Ireland was issued the other day in the form of a blue book. It shows that the proportion of insane to the total population in 1901 was 56.2 per 1,000, compared with 15.2 in 1851. The number of patients in public asylums rose from 8,667 in 1880 to 13,332 in 1895, and 18,094 in 1903. There was a proportionate increase in the inmates of private asylums. The figures do not include the insane outside of asylums, which is believed to be considerable.

The inspectors attribute the increase in the ratio of insanity to population parily to the reduction of the latter by emigration of the mentally fit and parily to the return to Ireland of emigrants suffering from mental breakdown. Available statistics do not permit of a definite conclusion as to whether there has been an actual increase in insanity, but the inspectors believe that but for the emigration of the strong and healthy the ratio would have been very small.

They declare, however, that the Irish are "peculiarly prone to mental breakdown," directing attention to America, where, they say, the proportion of in-sane among the Irish is greatly in ex-

In conclusion the report says that the question of the influence of emithe question of the influence of emigration on the development of insanity has not hitherto received the attention it deserves, adding: "There is every reason to fear that a large number of our people crossing the Atlantic in search of fortune in a climate and environment so different from that to which they are accustomed leave behind them the good humor and peace of mind so happily characteristic of our peasantry, and in the strain and stress of American life, and especially of peasantry, and in the strain and stress of American life, and especially of American city life, quickly break down physically and mentally. Of the large number who become insane many, like hunted animals, seek to return to their friends and former homes in Ireland, while those unable to return find refuge in the lunatic asylums of America."

Omnicarnivorous Man.

Omnicarnivorous Man.

The animal food of any particular people, says Ernest Protherce in Chambers' Journal, is more or less circumscribed according to seographical locality rather than by scruples, religious or superstitious. The horse and ass are cases in point.

The flowe with us is par excellence the beast of burden, but other peoples view its flesh with increasing favor. During the Roman occupation of Britain horseflesh was a common article of diet, but Christianity rejected it, at it did in some other continental contries. In France, in the seventesth century, a man was put to death for eating horseflesh. It was during Lest, and this, mayhap, contributed to the heinousness of the offence. The French are now large, communess of the meat. In 1807, when the slege of Copenhagen by the British curtailed the food supply, the inhabitants utilized their horses; and what necessity thus senforced has been continued by choice. And so in other countries, notwithstanding ecclesiastical full mations, the people maintain that the functions of the church are properly confined to the care of the souls; the oversight of the standing ecclesiastical fulminations, the people maintain that the functions of the church are properly confined to the care of the souls; the oversight of the stomach rests entirely with the person immediately concerned. Less than forty years ago over a hundred persons partook of horse fiesh at a banquet in the Langham Hotel, London. Though various notable men, the present Lord Avebury included, patronised the function, they failed to combat the popular prejudice. But all is notagold that gifters, and all is not necessarily beef extract though labelled such, especially if its origin is in a country to which the strings of sorry "screws" are shipped from our east coast ports.

From the horse to mules and asses is not a far cry, and in Central Asia and other tracts where the wild ass abounds its fiesh is greatly esteemed.
