Students, Attention!

Rare Chance to Secure a College Education.

We have made arrangements that enable us to place within the reach of a limited number of deserving students, opportunities for securing, on easy terms, a classical or commercial education. A little work during the vacation season will secure this for the one worthily striving for such a boon, but who may not be in possession of sufficient money to realize his heart's desire. The facilities at our disposal enable us to offer a year's board and tuition at

St. Dunstan's College

to any three young men who will fulfill the necessary, easy conditions required. These may be beginners, or former students of the College who have not been able to complete their course. In addition to this we have at our disposal four scholarships at the of Charlottetown. A full course in this excellent Commercial College may be won by any four young men or women, in town or country, who will fulfill the easy conditions we require. Whenever anyone satisfies the requirements in either of the cases enumerated he or she will be given a certificate entitling the holder to the educational advantages offered. A rare opportunity is here placed within reach of those desirous of acquiring a good education, and no time should be lost in taking advantage thereof. Only a little work is required in order to secure the coveted boon, and all can easily be accomplished during this summer's vacation, so that the winners may enter either college at the opening of the next academic year.

The World of Rome.

Rome, July 28th

The very strange story which has been going the round of the French Press to the effect that the Holy Father had wounded his hand with a writing pen, and that blood-poisoning had set in, does not seem to be borne out. Yesterday morning about half-past six his Holiness, after having celebrated his Mass in his private chapel, descended into the Vatican Gardens, where he remained for about an hour, driving from one part of the Gardens to the other in the simple carriage in which his predecessor was accustomed to take the air. He left the carriage at the upper part of the Gardens, near the place where an imitation of the Grotto of Lourdes was erected by the French a few years ago and from that point he walked back to the Vatican, entering it by the Court of the Pine-cones, and passing by the Museum of Inscriptions to his private apartments. It is only now, after the French have exploited the story of his wounded hand, that the people of Rome are beginning to hear of it.

The French newspapers are at this moment particularly active in spreading reports concerning the future action of the Pontiff. For a certain time past the public opinion represented by these journals has been eager in its haste to discuss what line the Pope will take with regard to the Separation Law; whether he will accept the humiliating conditions made to the Church of France by this law or, refusing them, put the Church now in the position that will leave to it some freedom of action, poverty, the frequent accompaniment of freedom. All sorts of reports, favoring one or other of these views, are going the rounds of the papers. Interviews with nameless Cardinals are put forward, and both sides of the question are presented at their best.

Attention is excited by these reports, and a public opinion is, to ascertain degree, thus created. One of these newspaper reports, pretending to a knowledge of what line of action the Pope will follow, has been disposed of by the Osservatore Romano of to-day. The Petit Parisien has from Rome that the decision of the Pope on the affairs of France has been taken, and that its publication is imminent, and that the Separation Law will be accepted by the Vatican. "The conversion of Pius X. to conciliation is due to the conviction that the majority of the clergy of France is contrary to resistance. It is unknown with what document and when the Pope will make his own decision known; certainly before the end of July."

Such is the account of the information furnished by the Petit Parisien. The official note which the Osservatore publishes on this says:—"We are authorized to put our readers on guard concerning the news of the 'Petit Parisien' relating to this very serious question; and not only to that, but to all the other similar news given by other journals, and to declare that such news belong to the fantastic and bisserating character."

To-day takes place the election of the General of the Order of Scapoli, or the Pious Schools—an office which has been vacant since 1901, when Father Mauro Ricci, who was General died. Since then the Order was represented by the Vicar-General, Father Bratino. The Order was founded by S. Calassiano at the beginning of the 17th century, and is especially intended for the education of sons of the people, and furnishing them with all that can develop intelligence and character.

Amongst the many important changes and improvements which Pius X. is making within the precincts of the Vatican, that of the renewal of the Column of the Council is one of the most interesting. The shaft consists of a great block of that marble which is known as "Affricano" from its dusky hue, and not from the Dark Continent, for the quarries that yielded it in the days of the ancient Romans were situated in the Island of Chios one of the Creek Islands, and claiming to be the birthplace of Homer, "the blind old man of Sio's rocky isle." The marble is peeling away in fragments from the effects of the weather. Its condition is such that it must be replaced by an entirely new column of granite, entailing upon the Pontiff an expenditure of over 21,000 francs.

This column is surmounted by a colossal bronze statue of St. Peter. It was at first destined to rise on the Janiculum Hill, in the centre of the space opening in front of the Church of St. Peter in Montorio, and the foundations were to consist of several hundred small blocks of marble, each one of which was to be laid by one of the bishops present at the Council of the Vatican. It was also intended that a list of the names of all the bishops present—there were nearly 300 of them—should be incised upon it. But the bombardment and invasion of Rome on 20th September, 1870, by a king who described himself then in a letter to the Pope as "a dutiful son of the Catholic Church" put an end to this as well as to many other great projects. The column was finally erected in the Court of the Belvedere where it is occasionally seen by visitors who look through the glass doors of the Chiaramonti Gallery, where they go to see the statues.

It is reported that the German Historical Institute has just purchased the Villa Maletta, over against the Convent of Irish Franciscans of St. Isidore at Rome. It is one of the very fine villas of Rome, and has been for many years past in possession of the Russian family, Bobrinsky. Its new proprietors paid 1,600,000 francs (or $270,000) for it. This beautifully situated villa, with its magnificent Terrace tower rising high above its walls will be used as an Art Academy for the students which the Fatherland sends here annually to study the art of Italy, and so to acquire a knowledge of what has been achieved, in order that they may profit by it in their future achievements. The only great nation which is not fitly represented in this home of art by such an institution is England.

The Villa Maletta has interesting art association, dating back to the beginning of last century. In 1810 four young enthusiasts in art—Overbeck, Pflor, Hottinger, and Vogel—came towards Rome. Their last stopping place on the road was La Storta; Rome shone in the distance, seated upon the celebrated seven hills, with the dome of St. Peter's showing over all, and giving the characteristic note to the scene. "Warm hearts and helpful hands," says the biographer of Overbeck, "to give the weary travellers greeting, and to do kindly offices for them." They were taken to the Villa Maletta, which was prepared for them, and there these pioneers of the Christian revival in art—unlike the semi-pagan revival of the English pre-Raphaelites in England of a later period—settled down for a time. Afterwards they took up their residence in the suppressed convent of the Irish Franciscans of St. Isidore and helped to keep the memories of the place sweet and holy. It seems a coming back to old times to find, after so many years, another German art colony settling in this historic Villa Maletta.

"Brigands at the Gates of Rome!" Such was the startling phrase that headed a column in one of yesterday's papers. That there are brigands still left in this lovely land is brought home to newspaper readers at intervals. This irrepressible personage was a noteworthy element of the traveller's experience in Italy. No English account of travels in the Sunny South was complete unless it had one or more encounters with brigands to lend spice to its otherwise unimaginative pages. The pinch of poverty, of fiscal oppression, or the opportune occasion, made the thief for the moment; but brigandage proper was a much more serious thing. The brigand of an earlier age, and even of later date, was an adventurous, picturesque, and little that was exciting about it. Its only interest depends upon its proximity to Rome and its occurrence in the dead sea, son. A certain Signor De Angelis, driving in a tiny trap to the farm "Pisana" to superintend the work of the farm laborers, was stopped at 300 yards distance from this farm. It was an ascent, where, by the necessities of the case, the horse had to go slow; and thus the person who insists upon an interview has full opportunity to talk and reason. The beggars in Rome and its vicinity choose such accents for their most impressive appeals, which must be listened to.

"Money—quittini!" shouted the ravenous voices from the shelter of the large oak overhanging the road, and itself the edge of a dense thicket; and the appeal was progressively backed up by the ferocious looking character who had a torrid it glowing a double-barrelled gun at De Angelis. The latter remembered that he was unarmed, that his horse could not be driven here into a rapid pace; and, obeying the suggestions of prudence, he pulled out his pocket-book and throw down a 50-franc note on the ground in the direction of the ugly, ragged, grisly-bearded individual beside the oak tree who held the double-barrelled gun pointed towards him. "The pocket-book also," said the man in the thicket. De Angelis pleaded that the rest of its contents was matter of no use to anyone but the owner. "The pocket-book!" repeated the brigand, with an insistence not to be denied; so the pocket-book followed the 50-franc note first given; it contained another 50 franc note. "Now go ahead, and don't look behind you," was the final recommendation of the robber to the robbed. De Angelis reported the incident at the farm of "Pisana." Messengers conveyed the information to the nearest carabinieri station; thence it was telephoned into Rome and a little army of carabinieri was dispatched to search the thicket. Malici, on the edge of which the act of brigandage took place, and the other thickets which abound in this neighborhood.

It is supposed that the man who "held up" as the Americans say, Signor De Angelis was one of the two prisoners who, while they were being transferred by rail from Civita Castellana to another prison, broke the iron bars of their cage and escaped into the open country. Two suspicious-looking individuals have been seen recently at different places in the vicinity; and near the place of the robbery there was found a small sack belonging to the Administration of Prisons, and signs that two persons were there.

There is quite an excitement in Rome regarding the robbery of a man on the desolate highway outside the Gate of Saint Pancratius, and there is comparatively little excitement caused by the killings and stabbings and suicides which are reported day by day in the Roman papers. Naturally, it is an awful disgrace that after so many years of "intangible Rome," which had its eyes opened to all the vices by the cannon of Porta Pia, there should still linger within seven miles of the walls the plague of brigandage! Hence the authorities are having the whole neighborhood examined, inch by inch, to capture this bold 19th century brigand.

An American pilgrim arrived in Rome yesterday. The prominent personage in the group of 132, of which 30 are priests is the Right Rev. Henry Gabriel, Bishop at Ogdensburg. It appears strange that travellers should come to Rome during this hot season when the dwellers here long for cool breezes and seaside resorts. To many Americans this is the only time when they can travel, and the heat of Rome is generally found less terrible than that from which they suffer at home. The Pilgrimage will be received in special audience by his Holiness on next Tuesday morning.

The Chapter of the Fathers of the Pious Schools ended in the election today of Rev. Father Emmanuel Sanger, Assistant of Spain, to be General of the Order.—P. L. Connelan, Rome Cor. Dublin Freeman.
