(Enter a messenger. He falls eathless at the feet of Caesar.) MESSENGER.

Dread news, my lord, dread news.
A mail has come.

HALFYARD. What's this. You make my very MESSENGER.

'Tis true, great sir. The ice has moved off shore.

One ship, is here, and soon there will be more.

(A long, mournful sigh issues from the attendants. Caesar, himself, seems to have lost all power of speech and action. Finally, as if going to execution, all file out slowly, singing)

There's a big, big mail a-coming Into the land of our dreams. Very gloomy are our feelings. Don't you hear our dismal screams There's a long, long time of working And we thought that we were through Now we're going down to the big mail room
To sort out billets-doux.

The Great Moment.

Elinor Glyn can no longer be reerred to simply as an author. She s now an author-actress, and appears in several scenes of her own story, "The Great Moment," in which Gloria Swanson is starring for Paramount, and which will be the feature attraction at the Majectic Theatre to-day.

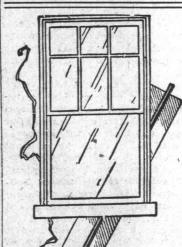

Questioned as to her motive for donning the grease-paint, Madam Glyn replied:

"I was determined to learn the motion picture profession from every angle. The only way I can experience the emotions of the players who enact the characterizations which I create is to actually go before the camera and put myself in the same position occupied by them. From such experience, I will get another viewpoint which will be most valuable to me in my writing. While I rank only as 'atmosphere' I find it highly diverting. I am doing this merely to get the player's viewpoint."

Her work in "The Great Moment" s not Madam Glyn's first appearance efore the camera. When Cecil B. DeMille was filming his latest proluction, "The Affairs of Anatol," she played in some of the elaborate scenes and experienced her first taste of how it feels to stand under the critical eye of the camera and the glare of Kleiglights.

In "The Great Moment" she wears beautiful evening gown of silver cloth and makes a striking appear-
