A TALE OF THE CLYDE.

CHAPTER XXV.

MANGLES' REVELATIONS.

"Well, Phil died, as the doctor expected from the first. His senses never came back to him, and his father, though he had no wife, and family but Phil, was glad when all was over. He was little more than buried when the governor told Jaquin he was about to sell off everything and go to Australia, and he wished him to go with him. He would not hear up in England, he said, after what had happened, but wanted away to where he was not known. The hunchback was willing enough to go, and it was just before they sailed that he took a run up to London and told me all that I have told you about Phil's end. So they went away, and I have never heard of them since. It's like they are both dead by this time. That's the whole of my story now, and it's a lot more than you bargained for, but once it was started I didn't see any use for adding up at the end of Allerton's business."

"I am glad, Mangles," said Edwin, "very glad you have told us the rest about Philip Jerdan and his father. It throws full light on certain matters which have puzzled me and one or two others. And as you told us so much, I may as well tell you that I can take up the tale at the point where your knowledge terminates. Jerdan took to sheep-farming in Australia, and prospered; he discovered my uncle, who was then a stock-rider at another station, made overtures to him to come and be his manager, treated him with every kindness and when he died he left him all his property."

"My eye!" ejaculated Mangles, "but that is a turn-up. And did he tell him how Phil had tricked him?"

"No; and his intense desire was to keep him from ever knowing it. To gain this end, he made it a condition in his will that should my uncle—who had taken another name on his arrival in Australia, hold any correspondence with his family—dislike to them his existence or identity, he would forfeit all the property that had been left him. He did not want to break this condition, but coming over on a visit to England, things have turned out so that he has disclosed himself, and hence my desire to discover you, and receive the information which you have given us."

"Mighty glad of it, I am sure," returned Mangles—"mighty glad indeed, since it has brought back my way, which led me to say that I've performed my part of the bargain, and my I ask when you are going to perform yours?"

"Immediately," exclaimed Edwin. "This very day, if arrangements can be made. Mr. Weggate, may I ask you to take the trouble to see that Mangles is shifted into comfortable lodgings?"

"I shall not fail, Mr. Allerton, to attend to that matter. At the earliest possible moment, Mangles shall be removed."

"That's the cheese," said Mangles, highly elated. "Dickie Mangles, my boy, you'll be in clover for the rest of your days?"

"And it is to be hoped, Mangles," said the Squire, "that you will turn your improved circumstances to advantage in repurchasing of your past bad life. There's much need for it; for on your own shew, you've been a thorough scoundrel."

"Eh? What, you bear malice to me?" responded Mangles with a grin. "You haven't forgot the old singing?"
