The manifesto issued by the league yeserday is the principal theme of conversation in England and Ireland at present. The London press treat it with a certain amount of contempt, and say it is merely a little idle boasting. The Freeman's Journal of Dublin looks on it with suspicion also. A few more arrests were made to the lateness of the hour-show that very large meetings were held in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago,
Baltimore, and other places, and at all of these of the carried from prison, have been are at all of these gathering the manifesto was received with cheers and approval. Mr. Gladstone's health is reported better this morning. The ladies' land league clubs are moving in the matter, and one of them has invited Victor Hugo to lend his powerful voice to the cause of Ireland.

Dublin, Oct. 19.—A land league manifesto says: Only one constitutional weapon now remains in the hands of the league; it is the strongest, swiftest, and most irresistable of all. We hesitate to advise our fellow countrymen to employ it until the savage lawlessness of the English government has provoked a crisis in which we must either consent to see the Irish tenant farmers disarmed of their organization and land, and once more prostrate at the feet of the northern states. It is believed there are many people in that conduction who can, if they will, furnish evidence of his insanity. Will they not do so in the interest of the care of his insanity. Will they not do so in the interest of the confusion, in which respect I hope none of the Irish race will copy me.

At the reception in New York to Mr.
O'Connor, the land league delegate, Mrs.
Parnell spoke as follows:

Ladies and Gentlemen,—I regret very much that I came here totally unprepared to selecture on religious subjects through several of the northern states. It is believed there are many people in that conduction who can, if they will they not do so in the interest of PATRIOTISM, JUSTICE, HUMANITY AND, MERCY?

Our Law Makers. Picton, Oct. 19.—There is a discussion going on at the present time on the expediency of making seduction a criminal offence. I give all the facts of one of Chief Justice Hagarty. The public can form their own opinion of the detendant's conduct, and say whether or not it would

Below are the facts : Mary Miller, who is now twenty years of age, formerly lived with a family in Desoronto, and while there, in the summer of 1879, became acquainted with Robert Nailer, the defendant, who is with Robert Nailer, the defendant, who is probably a couple or three years her senior. They became very intimate. He saw her home from church, used to pay her frequent visits, and played the role of a lover generally, going so far as to assume the poetical and indict tender lines. On the first Sunday in May the defendant proposed marriags to Miss Miller, who accepted, and it was thereafter current gossin in the visinity riags to Miss Miller, who accepted, and it was thereafter current gossip in the vicinity that they were engaged. The impropriety occurred in July and August, and a child was born in May of this year.

Hampton Miller, father of the girl, gave the following evidence: In May, 1880, my wife and daughter told me about the latter's engagement with Robert Nailer. He used to keep company with her. He made frequent visits to our place. On the 2nd October I learned my daughter was with child, and I went at once to see the defendant, who, she said, was the father. I said to him, "I understand you are the seducer to him, "I understand you are the seducer of my daughter." He says, "Yes, I am sorry for it." He said he intended to marry her. I wanted him to do so right away.
He said he would let me know in the evening, as he wanted to talk to his mother. Two weeks after I saw him again, and he said he would marry the girl.

James Jones testified that defendant said to him that he was the father of the child that he had promised to marry her, and that he would have done so but for his mother.

Defendant's counsel tried to make capital Defendant's counsel tried to make capital for the jury out of what might be called a confession on the part of Miss Miller. The confession, however, not only did not have the desired effect on the jury, but on the contrary, it convinced them of the girl's sincere attachment to her lover.

In answer to defendant's counsel, Miss Miller said when she was sixteen years of age a young man named Aylesworth had had connection with her; that he forced her.

Q. How did Nailer come to know of this circumstance? Didn't you tell him? A.

Yes.
Q. Where? A. At his bake shop.
Q. Are you sure now you didn't seduce him? He didn't ask you, did he? A. No, I told him.
Re-examined:
Q. How did you come to tell him that?
A. I said I loved him with all my heart, and that I would not deceive him. "That makes no difference," said he, "I think the more of you for telling me."
The defendant gave no evidence, but

The defendant gave no evidence, but when his counsel, Mr. Walbridge of Belle-ville, was addressing the jury the young man came forward and interrupting the speaker charged him not to forget some point or other which had apparently great weight with him.

The jury found a [verdict for plaintiff, decrease $550] damages $250.

Miss Miller is a well-to-do respectable-looking girl, and in court she bewailed the fate of her once cherished expectations and her fallen condition.

her fallen condition.

Who brought the girl here? Is she to blame herself? Is the young man to blame? If so should he be mulucted in money or sent to prison? Should it be an understood thing in our criminal law that if he didn't marry the girl he might be brought before the grand jury? Had such a law existed would not the defendent in this case have married the girl to save emergencies? Or wouldn't the girl to save emergencies? Or wouldn't the existence of the law have made him more cautious in the first place? Again, what should be said of the defendant's mother, who, in order to save her dear boy's reputation, was anxious to sacrifice the reputation and happiness of one of her own sex? Is it true that women

These questions will excite very different answers with different individuals.
