"Is Polite Society Polite?" is one question discussed by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe in her recent volume. It is an event for society when Mrs. Howe writes of it with the candor and severity which she, better than most wits, knows how to sheathe in grace of diction. The same absence of snobbishness and the same welcome to intrinsic merit are found in another of the essays in this volume, that on "The Salon in America." The once famous Radical Club of Boston was the prototype of what a Salon should be in interchange of thought, but to-day the place of the Salon is taken by the "study, culture, and social clubs." The essays on "Aristophanes" and on "Dante and Beatrice" are the most literary in the collection; the one on "The Halfness of Nature" is the most philosophical, and that on "Greece Revisited" the most personal, while the essay on Paris is by far the most brilliant. Its picturesque terseness and vivid, short, quick, panoramic sketches of various epochs are almost unique, and may be compared with some of Carlyle's famous paragraphs in his "French Revolution."
