

conditions and needs of individual countries. Some studies of this sort are being carried on under the Technical Assistance Programme; many more will be carried on under the expanded programme. This is a really useful way to lay a sound foundation for international investment. But whatever is done and however the work is carried forward, I would like to close as I began, with words of warm praise and sincere thanks to all members of the Sub-Commission and to their many assistants for their most useful report.
