Coming to the question of profiteering, the speaker said he did not believe that there had been general profiteering in Canada, either among manufacturers or producers. While he had no great confidence in governmental regulations and public commissions, he thought something could be done by the menace of investigation to keep men reasonable and moderate. "But so far as most of the manufacturers and producers are concerned, I am bound to say I have as much confidence in the sense of equity in the business community as I have in the sense of equity of parliaments, or governments are public commissions.
