ASTRONOMER MEASURES STARS'

Correct Theories.

Washington, Nov. 9—Using a radiometer based on the same principle as the little toy of black and silver vanes which revolves in the opticiar's window, Dr. C. G. Abbot, of the Smithsonian Institution, has succeeded in measuring the heat of the stars to the Underder millionth degree and the highest importance to scientists.

Nine stars were observed—Rigel, Vega, Sirlus, Capella.

Nine stars were observed—Rigel, Understand, Park.

The caperiments of the same to the ministence of the protection of the great 100-inch reflector there, began in July, and the results are regarded by Smithsonian officials here as of the highest importance to scientists.

as of the highest importance to scientists.

Nine stars were observed—Rigel, Vega, Sirlus, Capella, Procyon, Aldebaran, Betelgeuse, Alpha Herculis and Beta Pegasi—representing the principal types from the blue down to the very red ones.

"Astronomers have a very definite impression," said an institution announcement, "based on other kinds of studies, as to what sort of results might be expected from these heat spectrum investigations. But the outcome proved a great surprise. For instance, Vega and Sirius are classed together as both blue-white hydrogen stars, with few lines showing in their photographic spectra, and both supposedly nearly twice as hot as the sún.

"Judge of the astonishment of the Mount Wilson observers to find Vega showing its maximum spectral heat a great way further toward the violet than Sirius, whose maximum heat is not very much nearer the violet than that of our sun. Still more remarkable is Rigel, for it shows two maximums. One occurs, as expected, quite as far toward the violet as that of Vega. But the other, the greater one, occurs very near that of the sun."

One occurs, as expected, quite as far toward the violet as that of Vega. But the other, the greater one, occurs very near that of the sun."

The new study, astronomers believe, will give a lever to attack the difficult task of learning, the physical nature of the stars, although it was said that although the present device can measure one hundred millonth of a degree, the instrument for next year's work must be able to measure the billionth of a degree or better.

The instrument used, known as the Nichols radiometer, consists of two vanes suspended by a thread of two quartz fibers, each one-ten-thousandth of an inch thick. When moved by a beam of light on one vane the torsion of the twisting thread was communicated to a microscopic mirror and a beam of light was reflected on a scale.
