The policy of the staff has been to suppress all information regarding the numbers and organizations which would give the enemy a clue to the size or character of the army opposing them. The Russian officers captured at the battle of Yalu have displayed so much information of importance regarding the composition of this army that the Japanese officers consider that their policy of strict secrecy has been vindicated.

The matter of moving had never seen any fire drill on the Slocum and that there were no life preservers on the hurricane deck. Hose which had been bought for the steamer was of extremely inferior nature and almost worthless. Witnesses stated that no attempt was made to launch life boats. One life preserver from the Slocum was brought into court and was seen to be utterly worthless.
