THE CORALLINES.

By EDWARD HOWARD, AUTHOR OF "HATTIN THE REEFER," &c.

During the report that followed, which on the part of the medical gentlemen was by no means a light one, the plan of operations for the present was adopted, and in the space of an hour Frank Flycatcher and Mr. Flood, the first lieutenant, were sent for. As Frank carried weight, we need not be surprised that Mr. Flood arrived before him. The captain heard all the circumstances of his character into his command, and regarding his treatment, without asking him to be sterned, thus addressed him.

"Mr. Flood, I had imagined that, in commanding his Majesty's ship America, I commanded one of the best disciplined soldiers in the world. But I am disappointed. I hope, Sir Hugh Estlin, that nothing has occurred to make you alter your opinion—at least in my department," answered this officer most deprecatingly.

"Your department, sir? And this is, blame is shoulded off from hand to hand; responsibility goes from the deck to the cabin, and in the mean time occurs some plate that are had enough to signatize the ship."

"Mr. Flood looked all humbly, and seemed to stand in much greater fear before his captain than had been placed before a loaded two-and-fifty pounder, and then, with due hesitation, asked to what his commmander alluded.

"To what do I allude, Mr. Flood? In the first place, to your special pleading about departments. Are you not, as my first lieutenant, my eyes, my tongue, my two hands? It is not the safety and the whole well-being of the ship, under me, committed to your care; and you talk to me of departments—a very pretty professional idea."

"With all submission, said the very visibly alarmed lieutenant; with all the intimation of an angel, with the eyes of Cerberus, and the watchfulness of Argus would have been more appropriate; and the seated doctor, Mr. Quill, in the standing first lieutenant, quietly snipping his mustache.

"Though Sir Hugh is my superior officer, you are not, Doctor Quill, and let me observe to you, I think this interruption very ill placed. With all respect to Captain Sir Hugh Estlin, I tell you sir, that I will not permit my inferior to take me to task; and, sir, damn the eyes of Argus, and your own ears. Sir Hugh Estlin, I humbly beg your pardon, but the doctor is enough to provoke a saint."

"Two hundred and two eyes embraced in one damnation," said the doctor; "really this cursing on a grand scale; how many bastards, think you, might they make together?"

"And it is in direct violation of an important article of war, this profane speaking," resumed the captain, "and certainly no excuse or extenuation for your neglect of duty. Learn to keep your tongue in your pocket, and your eyes in your ears."

"I stand corrected, Sir Hugh," but may I be permitted to ask Doctor Quill, who is sitting there so expressionless, were to administer a wrong pill, a thing likely enough to happen, whether you would make me responsible for the man's death, Sir Hugh?—which would be still more likely to happen, if administered after eating at a table."

"That is a nice point, I don't think I could bring that home to you. What do you say, doctor?" said the captain.

"I think, that Mr. Flood has supposed an impossible case," replied Mr. Quill, helping himself to another glass of wine, and coolly observing the first lieutenant through the transparent liquor.

"But people do die, and dinners are badly cooked, and wads are sometimes out of order, and a pill is sometimes administered, and in all these cases, Sir Hugh Estlin, what would become of you, if you were to be held responsible for the man's death?"

"I am sure, Sir Hugh Estlin, that you would be held responsible for the man's death, if you were to be held responsible for the man's death."

"I will not be hard upon you, Mr. Flood," said the captain. "Don't know the meaning of it, I'll answer for it." But you shall come to me with good right to complain when I state to you the predicament in which you have placed me. I will not blame you, because that man suffered a person to come on board a clanship, and then to take me to task, and trouble me with his questions, and then to blame me, because I did not prevent it, is a very suspicious one—

"I am sure, Sir Hugh Estlin, that you would be held responsible for the man's death, if you were to be held responsible for the man's death."

"I am sure, Sir Hugh Estlin, that you would be held responsible for the man's death, if you were to be held responsible for the man's death."
