THE SONG OF LOVE.

With eyes that were bent on the ground, While tears from their oprings would flow, Young Cupiel at in a bover, Mending his broken bow; Pout, pout, pout, A frown his face d'erhung, A bending over his work, These plaintive words he sung.

"An ! me ! I mourn slone. "The world has forenok me at lart. The flowers and sunshine are flod. And left but the wintry blast. At morn, and noon, and night ! At night, and noon, and morn ! I roam a weary sprite About the world forforn."

The next is a beautiful description of The next is a beautiful description MORNING. When the tark with dewy wing Speeds the hazy clouds among Mingled with his caroling Yo may hear another song. One that from a homan voice Soundeth brick and merrily. As the angler did rejoice In its simple weledy.

One more speciem will serve to illustrate the facility of versification which is apparent in all his writings and which is most remarkable in one so young and inexperienced. A BALLAD.

Alast her fesse were but too true For tottering on she came in view Of her tover, as ane left him last. Her treasured flower grasping fast. Pale was the check Erewhile so red, And closed the systid, He was dead? One kiss she gave him and turned away Desparingly.

One kiss the gave min and control and person Despairingly. And since that day The simple person is saily say Two lovely sprites are sometimes seen Flitting across the village green, While the rosy to bowor E'en to this hour Fades not, nor decays a single flower.
