January 15th, 1874. when we reached the Capitol more surprises were in store for Araminta, the building was so magnificent, the law-making such strange slip-shod business. In the House of representatives half a dozen members are quarrelling over an appropriation bill. Gen. Butler was brandishing his arms and laying down the law while Hon. 'Souset' Cox was making vain attempts to oppose him, and Governor Hawley, of Counceticut, in the distance, with his hands in his pockets was occasionally throwing in a word. All this time everyboby talked to everybody else of read the papers or wrote letters, while the Speaker Jounged castly in his chair, and every now and then, without rising put a question to vote in a languid tone, which seemed quite appropriate, as no one seemed to care or voted either way, and Araminta could not see how he could say, 'The ayes have it,' when robody had said a word. In the Senate there was a dittle more order. Hon. Join Sherman was giving a statement in regard to the finances, that being his specialty. Here we saw Mr. Elliott, of South Carolina, 'talking with Senator Summer. Twenty years ago one would have called Elliott, a "likely boy." Now he is a Congressman of the United States. Did he cut down the lad and manifest as much sorrow as a tigress would for the loss of her young? Not by any means. He was not the kind of a man to indulge in any such nonsense. Telling the girl to go home, he did up his chores, left the boy as he had found him, closed the barn door, returned to his house, went to bed, and slept the refreshing sleep of innocence! He then leisurely informed his neighbors of the occurrence; and they, eighteen hours after the suicide, cut down the cold and rigid body, prepared it for the grave, and in due time buried it.
