Rippling Rhymes

WASTED ADVICE.

If I had taken my advice, and saved, in peaceful times, to-day I'd doubtless have the price, all kinds of useful dimes. But while I urged my friends to save, in deathless prose and verse, for vain and foolish things I gave the contents of my purse. While handing out the wisest words the statutes would allow, I threw my money to the birds, and fed it to the cow. If I had taken my advice—I wouldn't now be buying for two ounces at a time. My steak I'd purchase by the pound, like wise and and thirty cents, and I would not be chasing round to borrow fifty cents. And I could help the Red Cross cause, and buy nine bonds or so, and not be shivering in shame because I lack the dough. The price of everything I use, goes up, to beat the band; the price of whiskey dear and shoes, and hats to fill the land; the price goes up, not once or twice—each day we see it scot; if I had taken my advice, I wouldn't care a hoot. I'm in the hole, I'm in the hole, I cannot pay my tax, and I'm obliged to buy my coal in little neat sacks. My heart is sad, my feet are ice, I'm weary with disgust, because I'm laughed at by my advice, and burned up all my dust.

VETERAN TURFMAN DEAD.

BY COURIER LEASED WIRE

New York, June 5.—Sol Lichtenstein, 63 years old, one of the most prominent race course followers in the country, was found dead on the sidewalk under a window of his home here to-day. It is presumed that he fell from the window, whether by accident or design, could not be determined. He was reputed to have amassed a fortune at the race tracks and was a collector of rare books and possessed a large and valuable library at his home here.
