> which Lottie Blair Parker has written her play. There are residents of a New England countryside. There are plain people, and the story written around them becomes their plainness. Incidents of their everyday life have given the author her theme. The play portrays the simplicity, comedy and tragedy of the community, the purity and sweetness of which might run uninterrupted forever but for the casting of the shadows of the wicked city. This comes in the form of a cultivated city man with more money than morals, who has betrayed a confiding country lass under the guise of a mock marriage. Homeless, she seeks shelter in the household where the ruling spirit is a well meaning squire, whose religion prompts him to send forth the hapless Magdalene lest he contaminate his own precious son, to whom the sins of the world are somewhat unknown. The son, loving the girl for her sweetness of character, follows her and rescues her from death in the winter storm, and the father, overcome by remorse, forgives and bless-

OLD STEAMER PASSES.

Last Stern-Wheeler on the Skeens

Disappears With 1912. Before the eyes of western Canada there is taking place to-day a development of civilization no less revolutionary or suggestive to the imagination than the passing of the stage coach before the rumbling wheels of the railroad. As settlers pushed their way ever farther north in the Province of British Columbia, the need of communication between the intervince of British Columbia, the need of communication between the interior and the coast asserted itself, and for years the shallow, fast-flowing streams between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific have served as highways for the picturesque stern-wheeled steamers with their no less interesting assergers—pioneers and prosection assergers—pioneers and prosections. ed steamers with their holess resting passengers—pioneers and prospectors, for the most part, who have listened to the call of the unexplored. Gone, however, are the days of the stern-wheeler on the Skeena River. The old order changes and its deatherell as in the case of the stage knell, as in the case of the stage coach, has been sounded by the steel House Thursday night.

Playgoers who have seen the play will undoubtedly gladly renew their acquaintance with Squire Bartlett, who believes as his coach, has been sounded by the steen horse now puffing along the northern bank of that great artery which runs for two hundred miles through the fertile interior of northern British see of the river steamer. Owing to the expense of sending a steamboat up the river and the time consume rates is over, and the settler should have his supplies shipped in at a ed in this new northland.

While the old-timer welcomes the advent of the locomotive into that country, it is with a sigh that he bids farewell to the homely little craft that served his needs so long. With the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway op-These are the characters around vhich Lottie Blair Parker has written her play. There are residents of a lew England countryside. A Benevolent Innovation.

Just at the present time when everybody in Western Canada is counting the big profits be has made in 1912 Sir Donald Mann's typical story may well be told. He relates how a man in British Columbia met a man from Alberta and the two fell in-It is said that there are only two subjects of conversation in the West, wheat and city lots. However, this particular talk became more general and turned on the relative merits of the two provinces.

The man from British Columbia dilated upon the wonderful natural re-sources of that province. Any man who could work was sure to become rich in a very short time. Any man with a little capital could become a nillionaire with equal rapidity.

The Alberta man admitted that Brit-

"No," he persisted, "the farmers have very little real work to do. It began to be middling easy when the gang-plow and the self-binder came in. But the gasoline engine—"
