FOUL PLAY.

BY CHARLES READE AND BION BOUCAULT. Continued. A beautiful face from imagination, and we see his eyes and smile as if they were in his own hand or heart when we looked at him.

CHAPTER IV. Sarah Wilson left off crying, and looked down on the ground with a very red face.

General Rollston was amazed. "Is she well, my dear?" he said. "It means my mistress," replied Wilson, rather unquietly.

"What were you doing under her window at this time of night?" he asked. "I was waiting for you," said Sarah.

"That is no answer to the question," said General Rollston. "If all the answer I shall give you is, 'Then I shall hand you over to the police, without another word.'"

"Do, sir, do," said Sarah, bitterly; but he added more gently, "you will be sorry for it when you come to your senses."

"I have no more to say," said Sarah, with a message. "If you please, sir, Miss Wilson has a letter for you."

"The delivery of this ungrammatical message, but national query, was like a ray of light streaming into a dark place; it changed the whole aspect of things."

"What was the matter?" he asked. "I was waiting for you," said Sarah. "I think I must have got a blow on the head; for I felt nothing."

"I never mind that," said Sarah. "It can't be very deep, for I know I know it." "What was the matter?" he asked.

"I was waiting for you," said Sarah. "I think I must have got a blow on the head; for I felt nothing."

him one day, and said cheerfully, "We are all well, and just as usual."

"The patient opened his eyes with astonishment. "My Rollston's been?"

"Yes, my dear," said she, "and she is engaged to be married."

"She engaged to be married?" he asked. "Yes, my dear," said she, "and she is engaged to be married."
