A Terrible Tangle.

CHAPTER XXIII.

In the Darkness.

He crouched there till he had seen Ottershaw drive away, and then he rose and straightened himself.

"I have seen it with my own eyes," he said. "and now I know that what I feared is true. How else could it be that he would be here? I am gone, and he will fill my place. If I could only know that she had no share in his treachery I would be content."

The hedge was high and hid him from the house, so that he could walk without fear of being seen; but as he would have struggled on the strength in his limbs seemed to go, and he sank on to the cold earth.

"Is this death?" he asked himself; "and must I die here, like some poor lost dog? I, who have fought and struggled for life out in that awful sea? Yet," he added to himself, half wildly, "where else could I die so well? This earth is home; my mother's feet have trodden it, and she has walked upon it." Then came another thought. "No, I must be gone; I must get away from here. Now that I have seen with my own eyes, now that I know she lets him come into her home, even then she might shed some tears for me, why should I try to live?"

Then, as these half-demented questions passed through his brain, David Barostan rose, struggled to his feet then, with a groan, tottered and fell again. And as he fell he lay a desolate and half-dead looking creature.

No words were spoken between the two women when Ottershaw had gone. What words were possible?

There are some things which are too terrible or too sacred to be discussed, even between the most intimate hearts. Mrs. Griffin, in fact, adopted a matter-of-fact tone.

"I simply will not allow you to go upstairs again, Beth," she said. "I will join Mary. Put on your things and go out. It is a cold day, but you have never been afraid of the cold. Walk, dearest, and walk briskly, and don't let yourself think of anything for the moment. Beth, you hear me?"

for Beth was leaning against her, with her eyes half closed, and such a white look that it almost seemed as if she had fainted.

For The Nervous Woman,

Or the woman who experiences hot flashes nothing is so good to soothe, quiet and calm the nervous system as a pure glyceric extract of native medicinal plants, and made without alcohol, which has been sold by druggists for the past forty years, and most favorably known as Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription. In younger years some women suffer from dizziness, or fainting spells, irregularity, headache, bearing-down feelings and pain. All these symptoms of irregularity and female disturbance are relieved by the use of this famous "Prescription" of Doctor Pierce.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic "Favorite Prescription" imparts strength to the whole system, and in particular to the organs distinctly feminine. For over-worked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," house-keepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, it is an excellent appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

"My disease was called retroversion," writes Mrs. LYDIA McDONALD, of Meosco, Mich., Route 1. "I had nervous chills and numb spells and they would leave me very weak. Then I had inflammation and the doctor said I had a floating kidney. I doctored seven months with our family physician. He said I would have to have an operation. Then I stopped taking his medicine. After taking three bottles of Dr. Pierce's medicine I have not had any nervous chills or weak spells. I am better than for years."

My daughter is now taking the "Prescription" and Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, also the "Pellets" for nervousness and weak, tired feeling. These remedies have helped her ever so much in a short time. We have great faith in your medicines for female troubles.

to die out here, with no shelter, no friend—no one to help!"

Just as she was hurrying away, a groan came to her ears, and she stood still.

By a strong effort she conquered her fear, and, advancing, knelt beside the prostrate figure.

"Yes, he lives," she whispered, for she saw the man move, and then a strange, a wild cry broke from Elizabeth's lips, for he had suddenly lifted his head, and was looking at her. The cry was his name.

"David! David!" Their eyes met. Only semiconsciousness had come back to him. He saw her face as through a mist. Then he remembered his resolution.

"I am not David," he tried to murmur; but he did not know that his lips were too numb to speak these words. All he knew was that his head was sheltered in tender arms, and that some one was weeping over him, and that tears fell on his face like rain.

Lord Ottershaw gave orders to have his clothes packed, and returned to London at once.

His mood was so strange that he shunned speaking to a creature.

At all times defeat had been terribly hard for him to bear, but such a defeat as this was so overwhelmingly humiliating that he felt unequal to dealing with it for the moment.

Just when triumph seemed to have come to him absolutely, he was hurried back from the summit he had reached, and he knew that, come what may, there would always exist two creatures who knew him to be despicable and worthless. The realization that Mabel Hammond should have been sheltered by Beth would in itself have been something in the nature of a calamity a little while before; now it took a secondary place in his thoughts. He could only remember that he had stooped to a great treacherous sin, and stooped in vain.

It was natural that he should turn to the thought of revenge. He had lost Beth, but he could always make her suffer, always punish her.

He despatched a telegram to Lady Garland on his journey.

In it he merely fixed an appointment.

It gave him a sense of savage satisfaction to believe that here at least he could be master; here most certainly he could control and command. And so he would show no mercy. He would let nothing stand between him and his revenge. When he reached London he drove to his room. There was no answer to his telegram. This was unlike Lili. As a rule he only needed a word from him to rush into the most foolish, the most unnecessary correspondence.

He changed his dress and gave a great many orders.

"I am going abroad to-night," he said to his valet. "I shall not take you, but I shall probably send for you. Be in readiness to come at any moment."

As he got into a cab and drove to Lili's little, over-decorated house, he set his teeth hard.

"I have but to hold out my hand, and she will come," he mused, grimly; "and I shall lose no time—she must come abroad with me to-night."

And yet he could not shut away the vision of Elizabeth's white, anguished face. He could not realize that she was utterly lost to him, and that he was forever outside her life.

When he reached the door of the Garland's house he bit his lips, and frowned, for he recognized his mother's carriage standing outside the door, and of all people he desired least to meet just now, his mother was that person.

He thought there was a strange look about the servant who opened the door to him. It was some weeks since he had been to call on Lili, and this servant's face was new to him. All the time he had been staying in that northern town, he had thought of no one, remembered no one, but Elizabeth. It came to his mind now that he had not had any letter forwarded from Lili for many days.

"Sulking, perhaps," he said to himself, with a cold smile; "well, that will not last long!"

The servant let him pass in, in a nervous way, and as he stood to put his hat on the hall table, the door of the room where Henry Garland usually sat was opened, and Lady Ottershaw came toward the hall.

She had been weeping, and as she caught sight of her son she gave a cry, and her tears broke forth again.

"Oh, Mark! Mark!" she said, "how shall we comfort him? Thank God, you are here. Henry has been asking for you. He seems to need you. Oh! Mark! my dearest, you will help him. To be strong. He is so feeble, but his resignation is most beautiful."

Ottershaw looked at his mother, and a curious, a horrible feeling gripped his heart.

"What does this mean, mother?" he asked. "I have only just arrived in town. I know nothing. What—what has happened? Is Lili—sick?"

Lady Ottershaw drew him into another room.

"She would not take care—I warned her last week—but, you know, poor child, she was thoughtless and careless. It was only a heavy cold, and, with precautions, an illness could have been prevented. But the illness came suddenly—so suddenly that there was no chance of saving her. She died last night," said Lady Ottershaw, in a whisper.

Mark, Earl of Ottershaw, sat down wearily and buried his face in his hands.

Lili dead!

Lili—pretty, imprudent, babyish Lili!

Lili! sorrowful, heavily troubled.

Lili! The Lili whom he had set himself to ruin with such deliberation.

Lili dead!

The impotence of human power—the mockery of his own belief in his strength of will—crushed him bitterly. He had felt humiliated in that scene between himself and Ellen Griffin; he was doubly, trebly humiliated now. Something passed over his heart, leaving it seared.

When he looked up at his mother he had the face of an old man.

"Oh, mother!" he said, brokenly; "pray for her—and pray for me, too! God is good, and He will not reject our prayers."

Many, many days passed before David Barostan and his wife were permitted to speak together.

Many things happened in those days.

Poor Mabel Hammond was laid to rest in the little churchyard on the hill, and on the very same day there was a funeral from Lord Garland's house, and the dainty little doll-like creature, who had reigned there, was carried, all covered in bridal white flowers, to the vault of her fathers in Heatecote churchyard.
