For Her Sake
—OR—
The Murder in Ferness Wood.

CHAPTER LXVI.
He longed to gather her in his arms, to hold her to his breast, to kiss away the quickly falling tears, to comfort her with loving words. That she, this bright beautiful Diana, his first and only love, should be cruelly treated, filled him with pain and wrath.

"It may be no business of mine," he continued, with a proud movement of his handsome head; "I would never interfere between man and wife; but I solemnly swear that if he ill-uses you, as surely as the sun shines in the heavens above, he shall suffer for it! If a death of horrible torture at the stake were the penalty, I would avenge you if I knew that he ill-treated you."

"He does not! Oh, Lisle, you frighten me! He does not! It is my own fault that I am not happy."

She clung to him, trembling, pale, breathless, frightened, lest there should be a quarrel between him and her husband.

"I detest a coward," cried Sir Lisle, hotly; "and the man who raises his hand or voice against a woman is a coward—he richly deserves shooting. Heaven meant men to take care of women, not to tyrannize over them."

He looked so brave, so noble, so handsome, that Diana's heart went out to him. If she had but married him, instead of the man who had humiliated her in the presence of her servants and friends! And then a great wave of pity for herself swept over her that the man she loved should threaten the man she had married.

Sir Lisle's voice trembled with emotion.

"Pray for me, Diana," he said, "that I may not be led into temptation; for so surely as I see or know that he ill-uses you, that he hurts even one hair of your head, I shall slay him as I would a poisonous little or a wild beast. Do not tremble. When I think of your case it drives me mad. Oh, my dear lost love, why did you commit so rash an act?"

But she answered him only with tears. After a time she said to him, shudderingly:

"You must not stay here, Lisle; you must go."

"I will go," he answered, sorrowfully. "I did not know that you were at Ferness, or I should not have come. My wanderings over the world in search of rest have left me now as I started. The void in my life you caused is still there. I came back to England to attend to some business in connection with my property which required urgent attention, and on passant I called to see Lady Cameron, hoping to hear of you, but never dreaming of seeing you."

"You must go!" reiterated Diana, little imagining how much those words told him—what a confusion they were of love, of weakness, and of fear. "I have enough to bear. You must not stay here."

"I will not. One who has to live his whole life in cold and darkness is none the better for a sudden glimpse of light and warmth. I will obey you, Diana. I dare not trust myself near you. Oh, Diana," he cried passionately, as he took her hand in his, "these sweet white hands of yours are dyed with my heart's blood! And yet, though you have wronged me so bitterly, I cannot endure to know that you suffer pain, that you are unhappy. I would give my life for you even now. To know that you suffer is the very bitterness of death to me!"

"You were always kind to me," she said gently; "to kindness now add patience. And, oh, Lisle, if you have ever loved me, go, and go soon!"

She turned away as she spoke, for her heart was torn by the words that fell from the lips of the man she had so cruelly treated. She could not trust herself to utter another word; and he watched her in silence as she re-entered the house.

CHAPTER LXVII.
The arrival of Sir Lisle was a source of universal surprise, and to Lady Cameron—who remarked that the only thing she had needed to make her perfectly happy was the presence of Sir Lisle—one of infinite pleasure.

Imperative business alone had induced Sir Lisle to return home, and, as his love for Diana had not diminished, he had resolved that he would not see her. He decided that, after their terrible parting, it would be cruel to seek her; but, passing by Ferness, he could not resist the temptation to call. He longed to hear news of Diana, but he was utterly astonished when Mr. Cameron told him that his daughter was staying in the house. As he felt he could not avoid meeting her, it was better, he thought, to see her at once. Then he would go away forever.

When he went on to the terrace to seek her, he recalled the bright beautiful Diana who had bewitched him, whose very faults had a charm in his eyes that the virtues of others did not possess. He expected to find the same lovely face and the same imperious manner; but he found a heart-broken, despairing woman, whose beauty was dimmed with grief and whose queenly head was bowed in sorrow and in shame.

When Sir Lisle met the members of the household later, it was evident that he had received a great shock. For her sake, he would not ask any questions, much as he longed to do so; but he had not been at Ferness many hours before he gathered from the remarks he heard that Diana was a miserable woman, that her marriage was a terrible failure, and that Lord Clanronald had proved one of the most despicable of men.

He listened with a beating heart and pale face. If, returning, he had found her happy, even carelessly and indifferently happy, he would have been content; but to see Diana with her freshness and beauty dimmed by tears, Diana with her once proud dauntless spirit broken, was more than he could endure.

Lady Cameron talked freely to him, quite unconscious of the torture she was inflicting. She was devoutly thankful that Lord Clanronald had not married her daughter, and was grieved to find how sadly he had deteriorated. She told Sir Lisle of his evil habits, of the stormy scenes between husband and wife; and, as he listened, he bit his lip and clenched his strong hands in uncontrollable rage.

"Do you think that he positively ill-uses her?" he asked; and the suppressed passion in his voice might have warned Lady Cameron.

"I call it ill-usage," she replied—"at least, I suppose scolding and swearing and shouting at her constitutes ill-usage."

A gutter of pain and anger passed over her face.

"Does he do that?" he asked.

"He does little else," replied Lady Cameron. "Diana has much more sense and self-control than I imagined her to possess. She likes to hide from her father much of what passes, it distresses him so; and she wisely keeps away from us as much as possible when he is with us."

"What does Mr. Cameron really think and say of it?" asked Sir Lisle.

"He says nothing," she answered; "but I am sure he thinks a great deal."

He has looked thoroughly unhappy since they have been here. If he were young and strong, he would—Well, something terrible would happen. It is certainly a sad fate for a bright beautiful girl like Diana."

"It is horrible!" cried Sir Lisle.

They were interrupted by the entrance of several of the guests, and could say no more. But Sir Lisle found that all he had heard was perfectly true. Lord Clanronald joined them at luncheon; Diana sent an excuse. He soon noticed that whoever it was possible, Diana avoided meeting her husband in the presence of friends.

After dinner, when the whole party were in the drawing-room, Peter Cameron asked his daughter to sing; but she declined, making excuse that she was tired. Lord Clanronald walked over to where his wife was sitting, Sir Lisle, standing near, could not fail to hear the almost brutal tone in which he addressed her.

"Why do you not sing when you are asked?" he said. "What do you mean by refusing?"

"I presume I am at liberty to please myself!" she answered, quietly.

"You are not; you are bound to please me," he retorted, "and no one else. I insist upon your singing."

"I cannot," she replied; "I am tired."

"You shall!" he said, fiercely. "You shall sing when I bid you."

She made no reply; but Sir Lisle saw that her face grew pale, as though she was almost afraid to resist his brutal demand.

Lord Clanronald muttered savagely between his teeth, and Diana, knowing that, if she offered any further resistance, there would, in all probability, be a "scene," rose at once and went to the piano.

"What do you wish me to sing, papa?" she asked; and Sir Lisle heard the tears in her voice.

"Anything you like, my darling. Hearing you sing is always a delight to me," said Mr. Cameron.

So she sat down to the piano, and sang a ballad which could bring no sad reminiscences to herself or her listeners.

"A sweet, still night in the vintage time,
Where the Rhone goes down to the sea;
The distant sound of a midnight chime
Comes over the waves to me.
Only the hills and the stars overhead
Bring back dreams of the days long dead,
While the Rhone goes down to the sea."

"The years are long and the world is wide,
And we all went down to the sea;
The ripples splash as we onward glide,
And I dream they are here with me,
All lost friends whom we all loved so,
In the old mad life of long ago,
Who all went down to the sea."

"So we passed in the golden days
With the summer down to the sea;
They wander still over weary ways,
And come not again to me.
I am here alone with the night-wind's sigh,
The fading stars, and a dream gone by,
And the Rhone going down to the sea."

She could see that Sir Lisle had withdrawn from the brilliantly lighted room into the shadow of one of the great bay-windows; and she was glad that she had sung no sweet weak love words that could bring him pain. She was going back to her place, when, half way across the room, Sir Lisle met her.

Coaker's Bell Island discussed--U. S. Government Mines -- German Responsibility -- Uncle Sam Against

COAKER'S WILD CAT POLICY.
MONTREAL, Nov. 28. Commenting on the reported statement of W. F. Coaker as to the proposed increase in the export tax on iron ore, the Star says, "Should Newfoundland Government embark upon such a project at this time it would be of vital importance to the Dominion Steel Corporation and Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Co., Ltd., which between them control the entire iron ore output of the island. It is thought that any action by the Newfoundland Government in the way of raising the export duty on iron ore at this time might seriously disconcert the plans of the two companies. Not only might it make unprofitable an increase in the initial output of production to carry out trade made for a large export trade. It might also affect the price of finished products at their Canadian plants."

SEIZED BY GOVERNMENT.
WASHINGTON, Nov. 28. The seizure of the bituminous coal mines where the owners do not show disposition to co-operate in increasing production and the use of troops to protect all miners who desire to work has been decided upon by the government in an effort to end the bituminous coal strike, it was stated officially. In the mines seized the Government the fourteen per cent wage advance agreed upon by cabinet will be put into immediate effect, it was said. These plans the Government were agreed upon by the cabinet last Wednesday. Officials said, so as to meet the situation resulting from the refusal of the operators or miners or both to agree to the Government wage increase proposal.

INQUIRY INTO COAL PRICES.
LONDON, Nov. 28. The Government won a sweeping victory in the House of Commons today when the motion of William Lloyd George, Labor leader, calling for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the cost of production, output and prices of coal was rejected. The Government returned 264 against 59 for the measure.

GERMANY WILL NOT MEET DEMANDS.
BERLIN, Nov. 28. It is stated in authoritative quarters here that Germany will not comply with the demands of the Allies.
