Then-oh! then, you must think he is really getting better!" said the young wife, her face lighting with sudden joy. The improvement had been so slight that she had not dared to have much hope, had not even ventured to ask Nell's opinion, lest he should quench what little sae had cherished.

opinion, lest he should quench what little sne had cherished.

"Yes, he is really, though slowly, getting better," was the young surgeon's reply, but with an expression in his eyes that was strangely sad. "Now," he continued, more brightly, "when Mr. Vining sleeps today, put on your hat and run around for a little chat with Madame Marton; it will do you both good, while she longs for you and has been more lonely during this weary separation than I can tell you."

"Poor, dear Madame Marton!" said Shirley, with a regretful smile. "I have had to neglect her sadly. Yes I will do as you wish. I will go to see her this very day," and Neil was comforted to see that the look of fear had entirely disappeared from her eyes.

Later she kept her promise, and was Later she kept her promise, and was almost overcome when she met Madame Marton, to be folded close in her arms, while the woman kissed her with all the tenderness of a mother.

"You poor, pale little bird! How I have longed for the sight of you," she said, as she brushed the tears from her cheeks. "But Clifton is better, his lordship tells me," she added, more cheerfully, as she made Shirley sit down, and, with her own hands, removed her hat. "You have no idea how good our fine young surgeon is to me; he either drops in every day, to bring me word from you, or else he sends bring me word from you, or else he sends me a written report. Here, now, Golden-hair, drink this glass of wine, and then we'il settle down from a quiet talk." She had been bustling about, and now She had been bustling about, and now brought Shirley a dainty glass of fine old port, which the young wife drank, smiling gratefully, and thinking how delightful it was to have a little attention shown her; while she wondered at this strange new tenderness which was shown through madame's every look and word. She spent a restful half-hour with her, and felt greatly cheered and refreshed when at last she arose to return to her duties.

She promised to come often, and then She promised to come often, and then, after another hearty embrace from madame, she departed, feeling lighter of heart then she had supposed it possible. An hour earlier, for her ever to be again. Late that afternoon she was sitting beside Clifton, gently fanning him—the nurse having gone to catch a nap while he slept under the influence of an oplate; for he had been suffering more than usual during the isst two hours. She was saddy during the list two hours. She was sadly contemplating the ravages which his cruel sufferings had made in him, and wondering if his thin, white face and sunken eyes would ever assume their natural expression again, when a slight rustle near the door caused her to glance that way, and she saw, standing upon the threshold a beautiful girl about her own age, regarding her with great, tender brown eyes, and a look of infinite pity shining through her lovely features. She knew at once that she must be Annie Vining.

The girl, she had learned from remarks that had been casually dropped, had been during the last two hours. She was so

She did not know, however, why she had not returned earlier; that the letter containing the sad tidings had, in some unaccountable way, missed her, and thus more than a fortnight had elapsed before she had received it. Then she had hasteneed home with all possible speed, arriving just after Shirley had gone out for her walk and call upon madame.

She saw at once the attitude of the whole house toward the unhappy young wife, and instantly all her tenderest sympathies were enlisted in her behalf.

She had watched for Shirley to come, and, choosing her opportunity when her mother was engaged with callers, she had stolen to the door of Clifton's room to make her acquaintance and try to smooth her rough way a little.

Shirley flushed as she met the young smooth her rough way a little.

Shirley smiled slightly and nodded the lesired permission, and Annie stole softy to the bedside and looked upon her prother, whom, as yet, she had not been permitted to see.

She was wholly unprepared for the sad change in him, and, at the sight of his wan, pain-drawn face, she threw up her siender hands with a gesture of horror, though she made no sound to disturb though she made no sound to disturb him.

She stood quietly by the side of the bed for a few minutes gazing sadly down upon the loved features, while the tears rolled thick and fast over her cheeks, for it seemed to her that he must be just ready to breathe his last upon earth.

At length she turned and laid her hand gently upon Shirley's shoulder, and, bending to look into her face, she asked: "Can you leave him for a minute or two—just long enough to tell me a little about him? I am afraid that we shall disturb him if we try to talk here."

Shirley glanced at the sleeper—hesitated a moment, then nodded again as she whispered:
"Yes, come into the dressing room; I can see him if he stirs, and he will not hear us there."

She arose and led the way thither.

She arose and led the way thither, motioning her companion to be seated in a low rocker, while she stationed herself by the door, where she could see the slightest movement which might be made on the part of Clifton.

Annie would not be seated. She came close to Shirley and said, with trembling lips:

Annie would not be seated. She came close to Shirley and said, with trembling lips:

"Tell me truly, is he really better? Mamma says so. Will he get well?"

The latter was a question which Shirley herself had not yet dared to ask. She had tried to be content with the assurance that he was slowly improving. But that dreadful wound in the back, so near the spine, she knew was a very serious injury. There had been two or three consultations regarding it, but no one save the surgeons themselves, and possibly Mr. Vining, knew what their verdict had been.

"Yes," she gently answered, "Clif is really better, and—I hope that he is going to get well."

"Oh! he will—he must get well. I could not spare Clif," the fond young sister exclaimed, with a sudden rush of tears. Shirley's lips quivered in sympathy. She, too, felt that she could not spare Clif. Often and often she had said those very words to herself. But the long season of waiting and watching which she had been through, the daily sight of his suffering and battle for his life, had made her realize that his fate was in patient and submissive.

"You were with him when it happened —you saw it all?" Annie inquired, in a low, awed tone, after a moment of low, awed tone, after a moment of silence.

Shirley bowed an affirmative, a shiver running over her as she remembered that dreadful moment, when, standing by those glass doors, she had witnessed the dreadful accident, and felt as if her own heart was being crushed as she saw her young husband lying helpless and unconscious beneath those cruel trunks.

"Would it be too hard for you—do you feel as if you could tell me about it?" Annie pleaded; then added, almost tenderly: "It must have been dreadful for you, and I have felt so sorry for you, ever since I knew of it."

Her tone and look of sympathy expressed far more than her words, and Shirley's composure nearly gave way.

"Ah! I ought not to ask you that. Never mind, do not try to tell me if it unnerves you so," said the gentle girl, as she observed her emotion. "Some other time will do as well."

"Yes, I can tell you about it," Shirley returned, recovering herself, and then she proceeded to give her a brief account of the accident and all that had occurred in connection with it, although, of course, she ignored everything of a disagreeable nature concerning the treatment she had received at Mr. and Mrs. Vining's hands.

"How dreadful it must have been!—and on your wedding-day," too," said Annie, as she lifted her hand and

"You are a brave, patient darling, and I love you with all my heart," she whispered, impulsively, and then kissed her fondly on the lips.

This was more than Shirley's long-tried soul could bear. It was so unexpected, this heartfelt sympathy and warm girlish friendliness, and it broke down her composure utterly.

She dropped her head upon Annie's shoulder, a heavy sob bursting from her surcharged heart.

The date of inspection of the Twenty-Fourth Kent Regiment has been fixed for Teusday evening, July 5. Lieut.-Col. Peters, D. O. C., has officially notified Lient.-Col. Rankin to this effect. Much depends upon this inspection. It has been decided that 10,000 troops will go to Toronto for three days the first week of October, to participate in a review during the visit of the Duke and Duchess of York. Only such regiments as show up well on inspection will be chosen. The members of the Chatham corps, as a result, are paying particular attention to details, as the officers have great hopes of having a sufficiently drilled regiment as to be among those chosen.

Owing to the old custom which makes Sunday a feast day, dyspeptics often fail to derive any benefit, spiritual or physical, from the observance of the Sabbath.

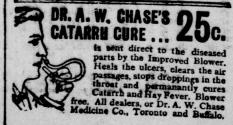

To such people Dodd'c Dyspepsia Tablets will be found of inestimable value. They are positive cures for all the forms and symptoms of Dyspepsia. They are in use over the greater part of the civilized world. Without exception those who have tried Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets are satisfied and glad that they did so.

Mr. James Beatty of Kilworthy, Ont. is one of them. He has used Doll's Dyspepsia Tablets. Here is what he has written about them:

"If Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets do the same for everybody as they did for me they are a great medicine. I saw them advertised in the paper. I happened to be in Mr. Horner's store in Gravenhurst. I asked the clerk, Mr. Sam Murray and the beautiful the same tray. ray. Mr. Murray said that he had run out of them, but would send for some. I told him that it wouldn't be neces-sary, as I thought they would be like other patent medicines, but I found different. I went to Dr. Camp bell's and got them there. "For years I had to be very particular what I ate and drank. Above all things I dreaded Sunday. Now, thank goodness, I can eat what I choose, and the doctor is in my own pocket in the shape of Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets. I am a different man. I had to take one every meal at first. Then I got so that I could do with one a day. Now I don't need any. Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets have cured me altogether. There are plenty of people to prove it as I am known from Toronto to Parry Sound."

An Old Croupier Gives Some Reminiscences.

Fast Track and Good Racing at High- Big Establishments Get Enormous Sums of Money From Their Patrons-Bank Is Sure to Win.

> [From Tit-Bits.] "I have been for many years connected in one capacity or another, but principally as a croupler, with several of the gambling casinos of Europe," said a croupler who until recently presided at one of the famous roulette tables at a famous continental public gambling establishment.

> "Few people have much idea of the enormous amounts of money that has been earned by the various gambling establishments. In the early days the annual profits of the gambling house at Aix-la-Chapelle were said to be £14,000. At Homburg the annual expense of the Kursal was £10,000, and yet there remained a very handsome profit, though I forget the amount; neither can I now recall the profits of Baden-Baden, but as the company which rented the Conversationhaus (as the gambling establishment was called) paid about £11,000 a year for you can guess the gross takings must have been pretty heavy. "At Spa (where the gambling estab-lishments at one time belonged to the Bishop of Liege) the profits were over £40,000 per annum. At Ostend the club in a season of three months managed, after paying a tax of £70,000 to the municipality, to make a net profit of £280,000. "The splendid revenue earned by the Monte Carlo tables has now become a proverb. That these public gamb ling casinos are productive of considerable harm it would be idle to deny. As a matter of fact, many more cases of suicides, murder and 'scandal' oc-cur at the various gambling resorts sum annually in subsidizing a large number of European and American newspapers; in fact, all that they can, in order to prevent such horrors from being reported.

"The papers thus subsidized are also freely used for occasional puffs and paragraphs relating to sensational and often imaginary 'breakings' of the bank. Indeed, you may be surprised to hear that quite a number of 'mushroom' journals are continually being started for the mere purpose of securing the 'retaining fee' paid by the 'administration.' I could tell you the name of one little paper the proprietor of which was paid by the 'adminstra-tion' of a certain casino 100,000 francs (£4,000) to keep it in a friendly frame of mind at a rather critical time. Besides the command they obtain of these papers the 'administrations' have other methods for making the best of

DOCTORS EMPLOYED FOR A SPE-CIAL USE. "At one of the gambling towns where I was employed there were three doctors—dissipated, ignorant rascals, with no practice, and whose peared uneasy, and I saw him look rascals, with no practice, and whose names would in England have long since been struck off the medical register-who were secretly and unofficially paid handsome salaries by the from tha moment he began losing, and the bystanders ceased to follow professional services as occasion required. If, for instance, some ruined gamster, after losing his last louis, shot himself in a quiet corner of the grounds, two of the doctors would be sent for and would, in a number of instances, certify the death as apo-plexy, syncope, heart disease, aneurism or sunstroke, and thus the inconvenience of an inquest and undesirable publicity was avoided. One these rogues, I heard, was paid £700 a year.

"Murders, too, were, whenever circumstances made it possible, either similarly hushed up or reported as occurring somewhere else. I remember such a case some years ago. The only son of a wealthy English merchant won about £4,000 at the trente-etquarante table. Instead of leaving it in the care of the 'administration,' which he could have done, he insisted on taking his winnings home with him to his hotel. Before he had got very far he was robbed of the whole sum and knocked on the head.

"And in what form do you suppose the news reached the public? Why, in this: "The unfortunate young man, who had been on a mountain-climbing expedition, was found lying at the bottom of a precipice with his head broken. He had apparently missed his footing, and thus met his untimely end.' That was the way it appeared in those papers that mentioned it at all. As a matter of fact, the poor fellow's body had been surreptitiously conveyed from the spot where it was first discovered to the supposed scene of the 'accident,' the better to substantiate the explanation given. "It is astonishing how the gambling habit dominates some people. I knew one lady as an habitue of the rooms at Monte Carlo with whom gambling beame such an absorbing mania that she made several applications to magistrates, and also to the resident doctor of a lunatic asylum, and used con siderable efforts to get herself placed under restraint as being the only means by which she could be pre-vented from gambling. Not being suc-cessful, she managed to get incarcerated in another way, by forging a check for £100, though she had no need of the money, and she got two years' imprisonment. Her story was fully told in court, which probably accounted for her not getting a longer sentence. "The persistence with which a born gambler will pursue his own ruin is major in the army who had just inherited £25,000 came to Hamburg. Being aware what an incorrigible gambler he was, he took the precau-tion of paying three months in ad-vance for his board and lodging at the hotel, and, furthermore, handed to the landlord to hold in trust for him, and on no consideration what-ever to repay him until he had returned to England, no matter how much he might entreat him. He began at the trente-et-quarante table by winning £6,000.

"Next day he netted £5,000. Then he alternated his transactions between trente-et-quarante and the roulette tables, but the refait and zero occurred so frequently that in a few days his capital was reduced from £16,000 to 10 shillings, and finally to nothing. Then he went to the land-lord of the hotel and ordered, begged and entreated him to give him his £5,000. The landlord refusing, he went and berrowed 230 from a friend, lost it, then went and sold his watch and the tables with £40 and again lost every farthing.

"The hotel landlord being still in-"The hotel landlord being still inexorable, the gambler got up in the night, broke open the money till in the bar, helped himself to the money therein—about £15—depositing in the till his I O U and a letter authorizing the landlord to recoup himself from the £5,000, and next day went to the tables, lost the £15, and as the landlord refused to give up his £5,000 until he reached England, he departed by the first train available, the landlord taking his ticket for him.

"After reaching England, no sooner did he receive his £5,000, less the £15 and traveling expenses deducted by and traveling expenses deducted by the landlord, than he once more set out for Homburg. This time he was armed with a 'system' which he evolved during his journey, and in which he had great faith, but in a few days he had lost every franc, and the last time I saw him, which was several years after, he was a porter and was carrying visitors' luggage up from a carriage to the very hotel at which he had himself stayed in former years.

"There are, of course, some habitues of the rooms who play carefully and know when to leave off. At Ostend there was an old fellow who used to come to the rooms every day at the same time, just as if he were going to his business, and would sit there hour after hour marking the chances on his card, and at last, when he thought there was a certainty, would stake a small sum and win the price of his board and lodging for the day and go home again. It was said that he aiways managed to win his day's keep, and never did any other kind of work.
"The methods and superstitions of habitual gamblers at the tables are often curious. They will back the red because they have met a soldier in the street, or the black because they have met a parson. Staking one's money on the number of one's room at the hotel is an old favorite fancy. They will back the day of the month, their age last birthday, the number of buttons on any one's dress, or the dates of saints' days on the calendar. Some of them carry little so-called talismans about with them, others are believers in mascots or luck-bringers.

MASCOTS. "A nobleman who was a familiar figure at Monte Carlo some years ago happening to see a hunchback, more than usually deformed, selling matches in a London thoroughfare, took him into his service, nominally as an assistant to his valet, and took him with him to Monte Carlo for a mascot, and whenever he played invariably had him with him

"I remember another rich, but invariably unfortunate gambler, a re-tired admiral, who, happening to become acquainted with a man though he never gambled, had the reputation of being lucky, actually engaged him at a good salary and hotel and traveling expenses to ac-company him to the tables and conduct all gambling operations on his

"Some years ago when I was an offi cial at Monte Carlo a young English gentleman attracted much notice the tables both by his wonderful success and his apparent wealth. The crowd, as usual, followed his methods, and doing exactly as he did, won steadily.

"Among these were two middle-aged dark men and an old white-haired gentleman with blue spectacles, who seemed intensely interested in youth's operations. The papers were just then full of a sensational bank robbery, and when I saw how flush of money the youth was, and noticed hard at the blue-spectacled gentleman and color violently. He had evidently discovered that he was being watched his methods. The blue-spectacled genold gentleman's side of the table and imitated his system for a while. Presently the youth went out of the rooms and the three men followed him. I went outside also, when, to my infinite surprise, the old blue-spectacled gen-tleman whom I had supposed to be a detective was arrested by the two dark men (who really were detectives) for the bank robbery. "It transpired afterward that the old gentleman, who, disguised by blue spectacles and minus his beard, had been 'following' the young English-man's play, was the managing director of a well-known bank, from which he had absconded with several thousands of pounds.

"The youth's confusion, which at first had looked like conscious guilt, was merely due to nervousness, consequent on suddenly recognizing his director watching him, who, however, had no idea that the young man whose play he was following was one of the clerks in his bank. The young man it was afterwards explained, had come into a small legacy unknown to the bank authorities, and having to take his holidays in the early spring, as junior clerks often do, came to Monte Carlo with the two detectives hot on his track. The bank director, I believe, got seven years."

A Pain Remedy.

The True Relief, Radway's Ready Relief

For Internal and External Use. In using medicines to stop pain we should avoid such as inflict injury on the system. Opium, Morphine, Chloroform, Ether, Cocaine and Chloral stop pain by destroying the sense of perception, the patient losing the power of feeling. This is a most destructive practice; it masks the symptoms, shuts up, and, instead of removing trouble, breaks down the stomach, liver and bowels, and, if continued for any length of time, kills the nerves and produces local or general paralysis.

There is no necessity for using these uncertain agents when a positive remedy like RAD-WAY'S READY RELIEF will stop the most excruciating pain quicker, without entailing the least danger in either infant or adult.
