TOMORROW AT IMPERIAL

The last exhibitions of "The Battle of the Somme" will be made on the Imperial's curtain tonight commencing the showing of the "Somme" picture, will be a couple of very interesting ratios, one the Animated Weekly and the other the usual mid-week series of magazine subjects. This would bring the "Somme" picture on the curtain at about 7.20 for the opening show. As the wonderful film is to be sent out of town tonight and will not return for any further showing here, it is important to those who desire to see it that they make their plans accordingly for this event.

Tomorrow the Imperial will revert to its regular programmes and the special feature of the week-end bill is to be a Metro production entitled "The Dawn of Love," featuring Mabel Taliaferro. She is said to be one of the most winsome women in the moving picture profession. The twelfth chapter of "The Secret of the Submarine" deals with an attack of bandits upon Lieut. Hope and Cleo, the heroine. There are many rousing scenes in this spectacular chapter in which a band of real Mexican ranchers are employed to impart added realism. There are only three more chapters of this wonderful serial to be shown.

at the Opera House tonight, tomorrow and Saturday, local theatre goers are going to see a distinct novelty. These pictures are the first real moving prictures ever taken at the bottom of the sea,—not taken in a tank but genuine under water pictures, photographed with patented apparatus invented by the Williamson Brothers which allow the operators perfect freedom of movement in catching the many novel and interesting scenes on the floor of the coarea. These pictures have created a sensation wherever shown in the big cittes.

The bottom of the sea is a world in itself and now the genius of the camera man brings us into close touch with it. Germany Now

War Situation in Nutshell

Discounting the Future

The whole world has been impressed by the show of strength made by the Teutonic empires since mid-summer. They have successfully opposed great allied offensives in the west and southwest, and carried on an offensive of their own in the southeast after suffering serious reverses on the eastern front. Allied authorities thereby have not been led to desire terms of peace from the camp, but some of them have frankly stated as a result that they fear the war will last for two more years. The public should not allow itself to be depressed by opinions of this nature. Our business is to mobilize air our resources in men, money and materials, and bring them to bear against the enemy with full effect at the earliest possible moment. We cannot do more than that, and it would be unwise to attempt to set all light to the privated during which.

ment. We cannot do more than that, and it would be unwise to attempt to set a limit to the period during which the effort must be continued. The one outstanding fact is that the sooner the empire brings its entire strength into play the sooner the struggle will be over, and the smaller will be the sacrifice of blood.

The writer believes that Germany's fice of blood.

The writer believes that Germany's

The writer believes that Germany's greatest; success during recent months has been impressing allied peoples with the magnitude of her reserve power. Without underestimating in the slightest her determination to keep the allies at bay, it is probable that Germany is using now the wherewithal for her defence next year. She is besieged. Her man-power is waning. Her output of man-power is waning. Her output of guns and men has fallen far below that of her enemies. She now can make advances only by using the advantage she still retains of concentrating superior shell-fire against the weakest parts of the several isolated allied fronts. But Ticket No. 91 the several isolated allied fronts. But Germany is being progressively defeated and only an inability to read the signs of the times can explain any other opinion. We have had more indications of German strength during this year's campaign. The collapse of the Verdun offensive, the difficulty of resisting the allied advances at the Somme, the collapse of the Trentino offensive and the disastrous defeats in Galicia and Volhynia cannot be offset by any effort Germany endure the better part of a million cas-ualties to hold the allies in check at the "The reason of my retirement does not endure the better part of a million casualties to hold the allies in check at the Somme. On the eastern front this summer, he and his allies have lost at least 800,000 men, on the Italian fronts 200,000 men, and on the Balkan fronts 700,000 men, and on the Balkan fronts 200,000 men, and on the Balkan fronts 700,000 men, and on the Balkan fronts 700,000 men, and on the Balkan fronts 200,000 men, and on the Balkan fronts 200,000 men, and on the Balkan fronts 700,000 men, and the Scalan fronts 700,000 men, and the Scalan fronts 700,000 men, and the Scalan front complete victory is gained, but Germany's best chance today, slim as it is, appears to be to discourage Russia by overwhelming Roumania. There have been times when we have had reason to been times when we have had reason to be concerned about the possibility of the enemy detaching Russia from the cause of the allies. That fear has dwindled. General Brussiloff, who won the series of victories over the Teutons in Galicia and Volhynia, says that 99 out of every 100 Russians are prepared to go on to final triumph regardless of the cost, and he is positive that Russia will save Roumania during the fall and winter.

It is extremely doubtful that the enemy will ever be able to make another effort comparable in formidableness with that at Verdun. He may be able to mass as many guns, but we suspect he will not have as many men to concentrate on a small front. He brought all his striking power to bear on the right bank of the Meuse, yet he failed of his object with the loss of not less than 500,000 men.
