BATTLEFIELDS AS GRAZING GROUND

(London Times.)
The question of the extent to which sheep could expedite the agricultural recovery of the devastated districts of France and Belgium has been closely considered by the Agricultural Relief of Allies Committee, who recently sent two expert sheep-breeders to inquire into the conditions prevailing in the war zone. Over a large area of the battlefield there is now a rich growth of herbage which could be profitably grazed by sheep, but this area is so vast that such an experiment could only be attempted on an adequate scale by the government in each country and then only if sufficient sheep could be procured. Here and there, however, farmers are returning, and to those who have had experience of sheep the Agricultural Relief of Allies Committee contemplates a gift of British animals. Conditions favorable to the introduction of such sheep exist on many parts of the front, and with the co-operation of the breed societies, flocks are being obtained which will eventually be sent to those districts where they can be properly looked after, and where they will be of the greatest benefit under present conditions. The Department of the Somme has undertaken to place a flock of British sheep at the Departmental Farm near Boves, and to dispose of a portion of the progeny to sheep farmers as they return to their holdings on the Somme. The Belgian ministry of agriculture is also prepared to make special arrangements that the committee may assist the stricken farmers in the Yser Valley as far as possible by gifts of British sheep.

THINGS.

(By Aline Kilmer, in The Bookman.)
Sometimes when I am at tea with you I catch my breath
At a thought that is old as the world is old
And more bitter than death,
It is that the spoon that you just laid down
And the cup that you hold
May be here shining and insistent
When you are still and cold.
Your careless note that I laid away

May leap to my eyes like flame
When the world has almost forgotten
your voice.
Or the sound of your name.
The golden Virgin da Vinci drew
May smile on over my head
And daffodils nod in the silver vase
When you are dead.
So let moth and dust corrupt, and thieves
Break through and I shall be glad,
Because of the hatred I bear to things
Instead of the love I had.

For life seems only a shuddering breath
A smothered, desperate cry.
And things have a terrible permanence
When people die.
Visitor—Rastus Johnson is very shiftless, isn't he?
Sambro—No, suh. Dat man am de most ambitious nigger what is.
Visitor—Ambitious?
"Yes, suh. He says he won't be satisfied until his wife am doin' all de washin's in town."—Life.
