BRITISH AMERICA ASSURANCE CO.

This Agency offers protection against loss and damage by fire, on terms as favorable as the character of the risks will justify.

Marine Insurance effected on vessels, cargoes and freights to and from any part of the commercial world; time and voyage policies issued at once, on terms and conditions as customary. Rates moderate, and losses promptly paid, at maturity, in cash.

The undersigned begs respectfully to inform all his customers and friends, whether in this city or elsewhere, that it is now absolutely necessary that all premiums for Fire Insurance, due him at the time of the recent fire, be paid at once, either at his Agency, or at the office of his Agents respectively throughout the Province. Policy holders will recognize the importance of complying with this suggestion, by reference to their Policies.

In consequence of the loss of General Index and Equity Book, he will not at present be able to send notice as to Insurance maturing, so that holders of Policies will each for himself refer to his Policy, and if he cannot be effected the premium should be paid at the time. In this way only can misunderstanding be avoided.

A WILD RIDE.

"Take my advice, little one, and don't stray out of car-shot. Some of the settlers pretend to say there are signs of Comanches on the trail yonder."

"Oh isn't that grand! Just think, I've been here several whole weeks without encountering an adventure worth relating, and I'll think it down-right mean of you, Uncle Consider, if you allow me to go back to prosy old Boston without first having been forbidden stolen away by some noble Indian and unwillingly made his bride."

What is the use, I'd like to know, of coming away out into this wilderness, if one can't be the heroine of some startling romance, and take back some scalps with her?"

Your tongue and finger nails would be a match for any redskin, little mischief, the tall borderman laughingly replied, and yet, as he watched the trim, graceful figure of the lovely girl trip so bird-like and joyous over the flowered plain, a momentary look of anxiety flitted over his face, as he thought how utterly helpless she would be in the hands of merciless savages. "Them down-east girls are mighty talkative in their pretty ways, but I allow, they don't amount to much 'ceptin' to love and take care of like a hot-house rose," he muttered turning away as he saw the fair girl enter a strip of timber a few hundred yards distant.

Milly Grap had come out to her Uncle Consider's ranch, on the Texas frontier, to spend her boarding school vacation. It was the latest of treats to her, the great plains, blue skies, and pure air; the rude home surroundings, the rough, brawny, great-heartedness of her muscular uncle and aunt, and the way that, in their childlessness, they took her to their hearts as a helpless, willful little love-courting waif, instead of a polished young lady—a role she was so tired of.

The fields and groves were her temples of worship, and on this particular morning they were especially inspiring. So she wandered on in careless happiness, now plucking a flower, and the next moment wondering if it wouldn't be nice to meet a bear, a lion, an elephant, or an Indian, engage in a fierce combat with them, dispatch them with her sword, and receive a pair of tiny scissors, throw their little carcasses over her shoulder, and bravely march home with it, just as she had read of heroines doing. Thinking it over, she actually grew impatient, and pouted angrily, because everything was so quiet, and peaceful, and safe.

A whirr, a loud whizz cut the air, and something like a cord dropped over and encircled her shoulders. Uttering a piercing scream of terror, she put up her hands to remove the thing, but with a thud that threw her off her feet and cut into her flesh, she was down, and in the next moment she was being dragged at terrific speed over the ground amid the most horrid and blood-curdling cries she had ever heard. She realized that she was lassoed, and caught a glimpse of a maddened, fleeing horse, with a frightful-looking savage upon his back, and she knew that this was her captor. She clung at the clumps of grass, and dug her tender fingers into the earth, she tore at the cord that so mercilessly bound her, but the maddened animal and his merciless rider bore her on over every obstacle. Her terrible position flashed upon her in a moment—it was more than human endurance could withstand, and she became unconscious.

When Milly, scratched, torn and bleeding, again opened her eyes, it was to look upon a scene of a most terrifying nature. The lasso had been removed from her body, and she was lying upon the plain, surrounded by a score of painted and bedecked Comanche warriors, so cruel, brutal, and disgusting in their appearance, that she could not refrain from screams of terror that came to her lips. Standing immediately over her, with brandished weapons, were two of the most savage and brutal of the savages, gesticulating fiercely, and waging a wordy war, which though she could not understand a word of it, she realized was in some way connected with herself. Several times one or the other of them attempted to brain her with his weapon, but was restrained by the other, and at last it dawned upon their poor victim of agony that the contest between these savages was for possession of her bleeding, bruised self.

The contest was left undecided, for, at a gesture from one of the contestants, another of the savages suddenly grasped her in his arms, and, flinging her upon the back of a horse, mounted behind her, and the entire party continued their journey, the rival savages, who were apparently the chiefs of the party, keeping a contest and jealous watch upon their victim.

Milly had realized her thoughtless desire—she was indeed the captive
