POLICE COURT Drunks Before His Honor

Morning.

The machinery of the law, which, during the past two weeks, has been rumning full time, had yery little grinding to do this morning. Perhaps the fact that-this was civil court day persuaded the intending offenders to postpone their outbreaks in order that the officials might not be kept too busy before ten o'clock. However that may be, there were only two drunks sleeping in the cells last night—Harry Lovitt, who continues to love it, and a new visitor by the name of Joseph L. Henderson. Lovitt was freed from durance vile but a day or two ago. He had been sent in on June 28th, and served his time. This morning for making an exhibition of himself on Brussels street Harry was sentenced to two months. This annoys him, as it will prevent him from attending church. When he is out Harry always goes to church. On his way down to the apartments assigned to him he made numerous remarks and displayed a strong desire to stand in the station talking to the officers. But his eloquence was short lived and he went inside.
