these great works. To such purpose I spoke to him ; but I am far from sure of the terms I used, for, besides that I am not happy in opening my conversation, there was something in the man that daunted me.

He directed a most curious look towards the red light near the tunnel's mouth, and looked all about it, as if something were missing from it, and then looked at me.

That light was part of his charge ? Was it not?

He answered in a low voice, 'Don't you know it is?

The monstrous thought came into my mind, as I perused the fixed eyes and the saturnine face, that this was a spirit, not a man. I have speculated since whether there may have been infection in his mind.

In my turn, I stepped back. But in making the action, I detected in his eyes some latent fear for me. This put the monstrous thought to flight. 'You look at me,' I said, forcing a smile,

"as if you had a dread of me."

'I was doubtful,' he returned, 'whether I had seen you before.'

'Where ?

He pointed to the red light he had looked . 'There ?' I said. at.

Intently watchful of me, he replied (but without sound), 'Yes.

' My good fellow, what should I do there? However, be that as it may, I never was there, you may swear.'

'I think I may,' he rejoined. 'Yes, I am sure I may.

His manner cleared, like my own. He replied to my remarks with readiness, and in well-chosen words. Had he much to do there? Yes; that was to say, he had enough responsibility to bear; but exactness and watchfulness were what was required of him, and of actual work-manual labour-he had next to none. To change that signal, to trim those lights, and to turn this iron handle now and then, was all he had to do under that head. Regarding those many long and lonely hours of which I seemed to make so much, he could only say that the routine of his life had shaped itself into that form, and he had grown used to it. He had taught himself a language down here, -- if only to know it by sight, and to have formed his own crude ideas of his own pronunciation, could be called learning it. He had also worked at fractions and decimals, and tried a little algebra; but he was, and had been as a boy, a poor hand at figures. Was it necessa y for him when on duty, always to remain in that channel of damp air, and could he never rise into the sunshine from between those high stone wails ? Why, that depended upon times and circumstances. Under some conditions there would be less upon the Line than under others, and the same held good as to certain hours of the day and night. In bright weather, he did choose occasions for getting a little above these lower shadows ; but being at all times liable to be called by his electric bell, and at such times listening for it with redoubled anxiety, the relief was less than I would suppose.

He took me into his box, where there was a fire, a desk for an official book in which he had to make certain entries, a telegraphic instrument with its dial, face and needles, and the little bell of which he had epoken. On my trusting that he would excuse the remark that he had been well educated, and (I hoped I might say without offence) perhaps educated above that station, he observed that instances of slight incongruity in such-wise would rarely be found wanting among large bodies of men ; that he had heard it was so in work-houses, in the police force, even in that last desperate resource, the army ; and that he knew it was so, more or less, in any great railway staff. He had been, when young (it I could believe it, sitting in that hut; he scarcely could), a student of natural philosophy, and had attended lectures ; but he had run wild, misused his opportunities, gone down, and never risen again. He had no complaint to offer about that. He had made his bed, and he lay upon it. It was far too late to make another.

All that I have here condensed he said in a quiet manner, with his grave, dark regards divided between me and the fire. He threw in the word ' Sir ' from time to time, and especially when he referred to his youth, as though to request me to understand that he claimed to be nothing but what I found him. He was several times interrupted by the little bell, and had to read off messages, and send replies. Once he had to stand without the door and display a flag as a train passed, and made some verbal communication to the driver. In the discharge of his duties I observed him to be remarkably exact and vigilant, breaking off his discourse at a syllable, and remaining silent until what he had to do was done.

In a word, I should have set this man down as one of the safest of men to be em. ployed in that capacity, but for the circumstances that while he was speaking to me he twice broke off with a fallen colour, turned his face towards the little bell when it did NOT ring, opened the door of the hut (which was kept shut to exclude the unhealthy damp), and looked out towards the red ly deep, and una made through a oozier and wetter e reasons I found ve me time to retance or compulpointed out the enough upon the again, I saw that the rails on the lately passed, in aiting for me to hap i at his chin, on his right hand Is attitude was ad watchfulness ondering at it.

.way, and, step: the railroad and r that he was a dark bear and s post was in as .as ever I saw. t wall of jagged a strip of sky : y a crooked proon ; the shorter ction, terminatd the gloomier n whose massive parous, depress. little sunlight ot, and it had an much cold wind uck chill to me, orld.

ear enough to ot even then ree stepped back

t to occupy (I attention when ler. A visitor e; not an unme he merely up within naro, being at last ned interest in

35